If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer." For it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on the scalp, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORINE. For the Teeth and Breath.
Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalcules," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Florine removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as asberry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO PORTSMOUTH.

On Saturday evening, shortly after seven o'clock, the Prince of Wales, Field Marshal the Duke of Cambridge, with Colonel S. C. Clark and Colonel Stephens, Aides-de-Camp, Sir Garnet J. Wolseley, Adjutant-General, and Lord Carrington, arrived at Portsmouth, having left London by special train at five o'clock. Their Royal Highnesses were received by General Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar; and members of the staff. A detachment of the borough police cleared the station as the Royal train drew near, and guarded it until the Prince and party left. Both the arrival and the departure platforms, as well as the body of the terminus, were profusely festooned with scarlet and white drapery, looped up with hexagonal buttons of the same colour. On leaving, the Prince proceeded in the carriage of Prince Edward to Government House, in the High-street, the official residence of the General commanding the district. The town was finely decorated. From the station gates to Government House the way was through a vista of Venetian masts, which had been erected at regular intervals on both sides of the streets. The spars were painted alternately red, white, and blue, and were surmounted with gonfalons of various colours and devices, and adjusted to suit all directions of the wind, like the pennon of a man-of-war. Halfway up each mast bore a trophy of bannerettes inclosing a shield, on which were painted the arms and mottoes of the Volunteer corps. For the sake of variety the trophies were occasionally superseded by ornamental triangular frames suspended by floral ropes, and bearing a variety of mottoes, expressive of welcome and congratulation, placed at equal distances apart along the lines of masts. In front of the Freemasons' Hall the street was crossed by an arch in the shape of a Greek entablature supported by composite pilasters, and bearing on each front the words, "Love and Loyalty to our M. W. Grand Master." The old town of Portsmouth was entered through an elaborate castellated arch flanked by octagonal towers, embattled and loop-holed. The arch, which bore as its principal motto, "Defence, not Defiance," was also highly decorated with flags, while its battlements were guarded by lay figures in old armour. At night the arch and the open space around were brilliantly illuminated by the British light, the electric apparatus having been lent from the Dockyard.

On Sunday morning the Prince of Wales and Prince Edward, with nearly all the general officers and staff officers assembled at Portsmouth, in full uniform, attended church service on Governor's Green. He partook of mess at Eastney Barracks with Colonel Mawbey and the officers of the Royal Marine Artillery.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1882.

In a political sense, the Conservatives had the Easter week all to themselves. Their opponents wisely abstained from platform oratory. Downing-street does not agitate. Even our versatile Home Secretary was silent, and at the customary Easter banquet at the Mansion House Ministers were conspicuous by their absence. Whether the Opposition leaders were exhausted by preceding assaults on our present Liberal Government, or, as it is more charitable to suppose, they had a definite policy in view, the Conservative demonstrations at Liverpool yielded something better than promiscuous denunciations, and may be said to mark a new departure of the party. Lord Salisbury as well as Sir Stafford Northcote, it is pleasant to state, feels the responsibilities of leadership, and his several addresses on successive days in that great city—which is as much the stronghold of Toryism as is Birmingham of Radicalism—were redolent of epigram, flexible in argument, and not deficient in purpose. Apart from the usual party cuts and thrusts, in which both sides more or less indulge, his Lordship had something definite to say on the all-absorbing topic of the day. Leaving the responsible Ministers of the Crown to devise suitable measures for putting down lawlessness, and recognising that a revolution—as he characterises the tendency of the Irish Land Act—creates a chasm in Society which cannot be recrossed, the noble Marquis suggests that the best means of meeting the dual ownership of the land sanctioned by that enactment is to bring it back again "into single hands." The much-neglected and condemned purchase clauses of Mr. Bright, which somehow failed in 1870, and have not proved to be operative under the Act of 1881, are brought to the front under Conservative auspices. Early next month, if not anticipated, Mr. W. H. Smith, with the full sanction of his leaders, will propound his scheme for creating a peasant proprietary in Ireland; or, as Lord Salisbury puts it, he will propose "to increase the powers under which the Commissioners can now act, to enable Irish tenants, with perfect fairness and justice to their present landlords, to become themselves owners of their land."

It is a hopeful sign to see Statesmanship, especially when free from official responsibilities, propounding a constructive policy as well as indulging in destructive criticism. Much good may result from Lord Salisbury's Liverpool speeches. Ministers are under engagement to state their views as to the expediency of amending the Irish Land Act before May 10, and the Conservative declarations of last week will probably hasten their decision. The presence of Mr. Bright himself in the Cabinet is the best guarantee of their sympathy with the object which their political rivals have put in the forefront. How it is to be brought about, what are to be the terms of purchase, and whence the fund to buy out the Irish landlords is to be drawn, are questions of vital importance, which will no doubt before long engage the attention of Parliament. All are agreed as to the desirableness of turning Irish occupiers into owners, and thus putting an end to chronic agrarian warfare and the evils that flow from rack-renting and cruel evictions. But whether this remedy can be applied without the British taxpayer being called upon to bear the cost of buying out, perhaps on extravagant terms, the present landlords, is a problem that will have to be faced, and is, probably, the problem that perplexes her Majesty's Ministers. How are a bankrupt tenantry to purchase, or even partially purchase, the holdings they occupy? Mr. O'Donnell has more than once announced that the offer of liberal compensation to Irish landlords will entirely suit the purposes of the Land League. No doubt, but we have yet to see whether it will commend itself to the House of Commons, which holds the purse-strings of the nation.

It is highly satisfactory to miss, even for a brief space, the customary catalogue of atrocious crimes in the news from Ireland. On both sides the Irish Sea the assassination of Mr. Herbert and Mrs. Smythe created a degree of alarm and insecurity which has not subsided, and the Press has been actively discussing not only the necessity of more vigorous repressive measures, but a reform of the administrative machinery at Dublin Castle, with a view to make the action of ordinary law more effective. It is something new to be warned by experienced Irish correspondents against taking too gloomy a view of the situation.

We are reminded that while some districts are a prey to anarchy, many counties are peaceable and orderly. The payment of rent and equitable arrangements between landlord and tenant are becoming more common; the Roman Catholic clergy, as at Cashel, are quite vigorous in their denunciation of secret societies, outrages, and midnight raids; at least a hundred suspects arrested under the Coercion Acts have been set at liberty; and the Government have sufficient confidence in the working of the Land Act to appoint four additional Sub-Commissioners, making a total of sixteen who are actively engaged in settling on an equitable basis, as far as their agency goes, the relations of owners and occupiers of the soil. The reverse side of the picture is the official return of agrarian crime for the month of March, which, omitting threatening letters, shows a considerable increase over the returns for January and February. Public feeling appears to be more disposed than heretofore to separate the case of the imprisoned suspects from that of the "village ruffians" who perpetrate outrages. That the Government do not contemplate early application to Parliament in respect to Ireland may be inferred from Mr. Gladstone's reply to Sir E. Wilmot on Tuesday, to the effect that nothing will be proposed till the House of Commons is able to give "close and effectual attention" to the subject.

The House of Commons reassembled on Monday after the Easter recess, invigorated, no doubt, by its brief holiday, but by no means cured of its bad habit of wasting time. Nearly six hours were consumed in comparatively trivial matters before the real business of the evening, the consideration of the Army Estimates, was reached; and a sitting which might have ended at a comparatively early hour was protracted to the small hours of the morning. On Monday Mr. Gladstone will make his Financial Statement; and although, owing to the dim prospect of a considerable surplus, expectation is not on tiptoe, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will probably have it in his power to surprise, if not to gratify, the country with an original and symmetrical Budget. Not before Thursday next will the debate on the First Rule of Procedure be resumed, and, if we may accept the opinion of Mr. Raikes, Whitecliffe will find the House still engaged upon that much-discussed proposal. Possibly, however, the new member for Preston may be mistaken in his forecast. Protracted and tedious discussions on a question already exhausted will only hasten the period when day sittings must be conceded to Ministerial exigencies. Why not now? During the present Session the House has already been counted out on seven Tuesdays. Protracted sittings on Government nights, but not to do Government business, and counts-out on private members' nights—is not this the burlesque of legislation?

If the Nihilists will allow, the coronation of the Emperor Alexander III. in August next is to be the occasion of imposing demonstrations. All the dignitaries of the Empire are to be summoned to Moscow to attend the ceremonial, and the festivities are to extend over a fortnight. But the Russian revolutionists have early shown their hand. It would seem that under the church where the Czar is to be crowned a mine has been discovered. A large number of arrests of high officials and workmen engaged in the alleged plot to blow up the Emperor and his Court have been made, and the services of a select body of noblemen, with a view to protect the Imperial family and maintain public order on the occasion, have been accepted. This implies a thorough distrust either of the loyalty or the efficiency of the official classes. To a certain extent, it may be said that the Czar's foes are those of his own household. The virus of Nihilism has especially infected the professional classes, who have no adequate sphere for their abilities. The thorough policy put in force by General Ignatieff has suddenly broken down, and whether he be succeeded by Prince Lobanoff or General Loris Melikoff, it is to be hoped that the Imperial coronation will inaugurate a reforming policy which will be the best antidote against the secret conspiracies which make miserable the life of the unfortunate recluse of Gatchina.

The spectacle of a powerful Government in possession of large funds which it is at a loss to dispose of is quite unique, if not piteous. Though the award of the Geneva Arbitration Court, in the matter of the Alabama cruiser, is beginning to fade from recollection, the balance, said to be a million and a half, is still unappropriated. Notwithstanding that the damages awarded were extravagant in the extreme, John Bull promptly and wisely acquiesced in the decision without demur, and paid over the sum of £3,200,000 to the Washington Government. Every demand has been satisfied except those indirect claims which were ruled out by the Court. Ever and anon the question of disposing of the balance has arisen, and at length a bill has been introduced into the American Senate to repay the amount to Great Britain. Whether or not that august assembly is favourable to such a course is not certain. Though this country has put forward no claim of restitution, a return of the balance would be an honourable act, which would greatly redound to the credit of President Arthur's administration and strengthen the cordial relations of the two countries.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Although we have had some variable days—a good deal of rain, a touch of the East Wind, a few chilly evenings, and, on Friday, the 14th, a trifle of thunder and lightning—the weather in Paris, during the last fortnight, has been simply enchanting. On the boulevard where I am sojourning the chestnut-trees are brave in blossoms; and the greenery all round about is so delightful to the eye and soothing to the spirits as almost to compensate for the continual peril of being run over; and even for that dreadful asphalt pavement, the glare of which, in the sunshine, half blinds you, while its painful perambulation makes you desperately footsore before you have walked a couple of miles and develops all your latent corns. Corns are very often like crimes. When you wear the easy shoes of an accommodating conscience you forget how criminal you are. But walk on asphalt in new boots, and you will soon have the consciousness of wickedness: and of Remorse.

But the Paris spring livery! White and coloured lilac and primroses abound. Roses and forget-me-nots are rife. The florists' shops are so many bowers of delight; and the Champs Elysées are so leafy that they should be haunted by the sweet-scented phantoms of Babet-la-Bouquetière, Fleur de Marie, Rose Pompon, and Jenny Vertpré. A Paris feuilletonniste writes that one of his confrères from the sunny but torrid and burnt-up South, who has come to Paris on a visit, declares that the brightest fascination of the capital is in the greenness of the vegetation—he should see Russell-square, W.C.—while there has once more been trotted out the historic anecdote of the little girl who, after admiring the verdure in the Tuileries gardens, asks her mamma "whether there are any nice trees in the country."

There must be more poetry in the English soul than the cynics ordinarily imagine. I learn from a curious communication to a contemporary that the first anniversary of the death of the Earl of Beaconsfield has been commemorated by an extensive demand among the West-End florists for little bouquets of primroses, the favourite flower of the deceased statesman. When I return to town I must ask Mrs. Buck, of the Central Avenue, how many "Beaconsfield buttonholers" she has sold. The author of the curious communication alluded to indulges in some erudite disquisitions concerning certain flowers which have been associated with famous personages; but he omits to mention the violets which the Bonapartists wear on the anniversaries of the deaths of Napoleon III. and the Prince Imperial. The violet, of course, was the occult emblem assumed by the partisans of Napoleon I. in 1814, as a reminder that "Corporal Violet" would return from Elba in the spring-time.

I don't know whether the Corsican was fond of flowers. He should have been so: seeing that Ajaccio is a very home of Flora. But a flower was, nevertheless, the cause of one of the very best puns ever made in his disparagement. I dare say the anecdote which I am about to relate is familiar to most of my readers; but it is good enough to bear retelling. At a ball at Milan, shortly after the coronation of "Napoleone il Grande" as King of Italy, he noticed a lady who was wearing in her corsage a bouquet of singular beauty. The Conqueror was habitually rude to women; and he snatched the nosegay from the lady, saying, with a clumsy effort to be affable, "Tutti gli Italiani sono ladroni"—all Italians are thieves. "No, Maestà," answered, with a profound curtsy, the despoiled dame, "non tutti, ma buona parte." She had him there. It was as stinging a retort as that of the famous Prussian partisan chief, Major Schill, to whom the Emperor and King had sent a missive insultingly addressed, "Schill, Chef de Brigands." The Major wrote back to "Bonaparte, Chef de Tous les Brigands."

They were crying, in order to sell their catchpennies on the upper boulevards the other night, the "Death of Prince Victor Napoleon." The Emperor Alexander III. and President Arthur are generally assassinated about twice a week by the catchpenny criers; and a French friend tells me that at the entrance to the Passage Jouffroy, the place par excellence for gobemouche and catchpenny resort, the Bank of England is habitually blown up by Fenians on Saturday nights. Journals of the most revolting kind are openly sold in the most frequented thoroughfares; the newspaper kiosques and the shop-windows teem with the grossest pictures and caricatures. Citizen Henri Rochefort, in the Intransigeant, when he is not abusing M. Gambetta as though the deputy for Belleville were a convicted pickpocket, or inveighing against the British Government as equally cowardly and ferocious for imprisoning Mr. Parnell in a "cul de basse fosse," or underground dungeon, is bellowing "screeds" of furious Atheism; and the poet demagogue and deputy, M. Clovis Hugues, is denouncing, in furious stanzas, the cruelty and injustice of requiring the working classes to pay any rent. I have only seen four revolutions in France, and would not for a moment pretend to be prophetic as to her politics; but I should not be surprised if a "blow-up" of some kind were to take place in the Gay City ere long.

"H. C. P." (Exmouth) kindly writes to tell me of a Devonshire word with which, he thinks, I may not be acquainted. "What we should call a lock-up, or police station," says H. C. P., "the oldest inhabitants at Exmouth call a 'Clink,' which suggests iron-bound doors being shut with a metallic clang." But I venture to doubt "Clink" being an exclusively Devonian word for a place of confinement. Centuries ago there was in Southwark a prison known as the Borough "Clink." It is possible that the provinces borrowed the word from the metropolis; even as Liverpool borrowed the cockney Bridewell and Dublin the cockney Newgate. There seems to be one term for a place of incarceration which would seem to be wholly obsolete. That is "round house." Are there any "cages" left in the country? When I was young, the old structure now rebuilt as the Vine-street police station bore on its façade the inscription "St. James's Watch House."

A Caballero, who does not give his name, writes me in Castilian, from Higuer Broughton, Manchester, and incloses me the annexed and very interesting extract from the Catholic Times and Opinion, respecting the expression "Save the Mark."

THE CROSS-MARK.—The mark which persons who are unable to write are required to make instead of their signature in the form of a cross, and this practice having formerly been followed by kings and nobles is constantly referred to as an instance of the deplorable ignorance of ancient times. This signature is not, however, invariable proof of such ignorance. Anciently, the use of this mark was not confined to illiterate persons; for among the Saxons the mark of the cross, as an attestation of the good faith of the person signing, was required to be attached to the signature of those who could write, as well as to stand in the place of the signature of those who could not write. In those times, if a man could write or even read, his knowledge was considered proof positive presumptive that he was in holy orders. The word clericus, or clerk, was synonymous with penman; and the laity, or people who were not clerks, did not feel any urgent necessity for the use of letters. The ancient use of the cross was, therefore, universal alike by those who could and by those who could not write. It was, indeed, the symbol of an oath from its early associations, and generally the mark. On this account Mr. Charles Knight, in his notes, in the "Pictorial Shakespeare," explains the expression of "God save the mark!" as a form of ejaculation approaching to the character of an oath. This phrase occurs three or more times in the plays of Shakespeare, but for a long time was left by the commentators in its original obscurity.

Touching the benediction attending sneezing, "E. R. C.," Woodford, remarks that the custom dates from "primitive" times, when the act of sternutation was superstitiously thought to mark the exit of a demon from a possessed body; and "that it is consequently incalculably older than that sign of the cross with which it has since been frequently associated." My correspondent refers me, in this connection, to Tylor's "Primitive Culture."

Lord Sandon, with other Tory magnificoes, has been "orating" at Liverpool on the blessings of Conservatism; and a wickied reporter of the Times has, in noting a speech in which Radical was contrasted with Conservative "progress," put the following into his Lordship's mouth:—"He could compare such progress only to that depicted by one of the great painters of England: 'The Rake's Progress' and 'The Road to Ruin'." Of course Lord Sandon is aware that the former series of pictures were painted by William Hogarth, and the latter by Mr. William Powell Frith, R.A. With "two" instead of "one of the great painters of England," the passage (although entirely nonsensical in its reference to Liberal progress) would have passed muster well enough. By-the-way, when is that regeneration of Asia Minor by means of the steam-plough which my Lord Sandon promised us when he was last in office, to come to pass?

A more serious mistake has been made, not by a reporter, but by the Paris correspondent of the "Journal de la Cité," as the Parisians delight to call the Times, in connection with the late Madame Eve de Balzac. The obituary notice of the widow of the illustrious novelist and Philosopher of Human Life contained the cruel insinuation that Honoré de Balzac lived many years with the widowed Madame Eve de Hanska before, as the Times put it, "the marriage ceremony was gone through." The most superficial acquaintance with the published correspondence of Balzac would be sufficient to prove that the statement was altogether as inexact as it was unjust. A man who almost worshipped his mother as Balzac did would scarcely have begged her blessing on his marriage with his quondam mistress.

But I am glad that Mr. Clarence C. Wason has written from Paris to vindicate the fair fame of Madame Eve de Balzac, and to prove that the noble Polish lady, the relict of the great writer of "La Comédie Humaine," bore a perfectly unsullied reputation. The blunder in the Times probably arose from a hasty translation of a careless statement in one of the Parisian papers to the effect that Balzac "vécut longtemps auprès Madame de Hanska." Yes; he lived near her from time to time. He made long journeys to Germany, to Italy, to Poland, and to Russia to be near her and her daughter. He was Don Quixote and she was Dulcinea del Toboso; or rather, he was Sir Roger de Coverley and she was the perverse widow—a widow, however, who relented at last, but only to make her second husband happy for a brief half year.

Cagliostro come again; Joseph Balsamo to the fore once more, Nicolas Flamel redivivus, and Balzac's own Balthazar Claes—only a fraudulent Balthazar—once more absorbed in "La Recherche de l'Absolu." Stranger than all is history repeating itself in the shape of a Prince de Rohan being bamboozled by a resuscitated Cagliostro. The Paris Tribunal of Correctional Police has lately condemned in contumaciam to two years' imprisonment an American chemist named Wise, or Wyse, who was accused of swindling M. le Prince Benjamin de Rohan and M. le Comte de Sparre out of a sum exceeding thirteen thousand francs, under pretence of making gold. In the presence of his two noble dupes, the pseudo-chemist placed in a crucible portions of gold, silver, copper, and lead, together with certain red powders. At the precise moment of fusion the assistants were asked to turn away their heads, as Mr. Wise or Wyse did not wish his grand secret to be divulged yet awhile; and besides, as the Prince Benjamin de Rohan naïvely explained at the trial, the crucible emitted such a horrible odour that he was glad to give it a wide berth.

At all events, out of his hocus-pocus Mr. Wise or Wyse produced a nugget which, on being assayed, was found to contain a large quantity of pure gold. The two noblemen, thinking that they saw "millions in it," agreed to become the partners of the ingenious American in his "Recherche de l'Absolu," and advanced him certain moneys wherewith to carry on his experiments. The "Moneyspinner" hired premises in the neighbourhood of Paris, to be used as a gold-making laboratory, and then he did as the unscrupulous shopkeeper in the "Sketches by Boz" did: he "locked the door, and bolted himself." Shortly afterwards the Comte de Sparre died; and the duty of prosecuting Cagliostro the Second devolved on Prince Benjamin de Rohan.

I dare say Mr. Wise or Wyse will be heard of again—but not in France—in connection with alchemy, and that he will find more people to believe in him.

Of course, gold will be made some day; and electricity will take the place of the long-sought Philosopher's Stone. Some of the old alchemists held that gold was only a compound of Mercury and Light. If we can store electricity, why should we not be able to bottle sunshine? Meanwhile, it would be prudent not to go into partnership with adventurers who profess to be able to make gold.

A wag has lent to Prince Florestan—I mean Prince Charles, Sovereign Prince of Monaco—the expression of a preposterous intention, should the French or the Italian Government show a determined resolution to force him to suppress the gaming-tables of Monte Carlo, to sell the entire principality of Monaco, "lock, stock, and barrel," to the United States. Were such an offer made to the United States Government, the Secretary of State would be, of course, too well bred to paraphrase the reply of Louis XV. to the Doge of Genoa, when that potentate proposed to surrender the territory of the Genoese Republic to France. "Vous vous êtes donnés à moi," quoth the Grand Monarque, "et moi je vous donne au Diable!" The acquisition of the tripot of Monte Carlo and the adjoining rock of Monaco by the Great Republic of the West might please "Truthful James" and the "Heathen Chinese," and all the confraternity of Poker Flat, Faro Gulch, and Euchre Cañon; but only fancy the horror and indignation which would arise in pious New England, and in immaculate Boston in particular, if Mrs. General Gilforey, "who has lived so long in Europe," were enticed to back the red or stake heavily on Zero, under the protection of the Stars and Stripes! Boston must have been once upon a time the most innocent city in the Union. When I first went to America, close upon twenty years ago, an elderly gentleman told me that he very well remembered the importation of the first billiard table—disguised as a grand pianoforte—intended to be used for public play in Boston. Was he "gammoning the Britisher," I wonder?

Paris would regret the suppression of Monte Carlo. So would fashionable and Clubland London. But throughout the South of France and that portion of Italy which borders on France there is a deep and steadily growing feeling in favour of abolishing this splendid nuisance and highly decorative curse. The opposition of Nice to Monte Carlo is not quite free from a self-interested bias. The Casino carried on by the executors of the exemplary Monsieur and Madame Blanc offers what French tradesmen call une concurrence déloyale to the Circle de la Méditerranée at Nice, and to the hotel, café, restaurant, and bric-à-brac shop keepers of Garibaldi's native town. Moreover, Monte Carlo attracts the most dangerous rascals of both sexes to be found in the whole world to the beautiful shores of the Mesogean sea.

A very ancient gamester, with whom I had the disadvantage to be acquainted about a dozen years since, used often to tell me that he clearly foresaw a time when the united public opinion of Europe would make the abrogation of Monte Carlo inevitable. What was to be done in the interest of the punters? Havana was too far off. The King of Portugal might decline to sell Madeira for gambling-house uses; and the Great Powers would never permit the Sultan to allow a public gaming-table to be set up at Constantinople: although the Concessionaires of a Monte Carlo on the Sea of Marmora (think of the Russian connection from the Black Sea) might very well afford out of their profits after, say, ten years' operations, to pave and light Stamboul and Pera, build a suspension-bridge across the Bosphorus, provide all the pariah dogs with kennels and daily rations, and pay off all the Turkish coupons, at par. A Dream not to be realised.

Still my veteran gaming acquaintance thought that something might be done by constructing an island, beyond the three miles limit, off the coast of England or of France. It was only a question, he said, of capital and engineering enterprise. You were to keep on lowering caissons full of stones into the sea till you obtained a foundation, and then you built up and up to the sea level; and then you built the plateau of your island; and there you were! A sanguine man. He went wrong, I am afraid, subsequently.

It is with the deepest grief that I hear of the death, at Birchington-on-Sea, of my dear friend Dante Gabriel Rossetti, the son of the famous Italian poet and commentator of Dante, and the brother of William Rossetti, the learned critic and editor of Shelley, and of Christina Rossetti, the accomplished writer of "The Shadow of Dante" and "Goblin Market." Dante Gabriel Rossetti, Painter and Poet, was only fifty-three. Long years more of beauteous art labour might have been expected for him; but the expectation, to those who knew him closely during his later years of valetudinarianism, must have been a hoping against hope. I must have known him nearly thirty years; and a photograph which he gave me of a wonderful pen-and-ink drawing of his "Mary Magdalen at the House of Simon the Pharisee," and which I have at home, is dated, in his own handwriting, 1858. Between that time and the day of my leaving England recently, I suppose that I did not see him half-a-dozen times; but we did not cease to keep up an affectionate epistolary intercourse. Of Dante Rossetti's great powers as a painter, the art-critic of this journal will, I rest assured, speak with candour and appreciation. I can only speak of him, here, as a Man, intellectually fit to rank with the most gifted; personally gentle, amiable, truthful, and upright. His life was secluded, and his artistic achievements were imperfectly known to the vulgar; but there is in London at least one palatial mansion which, in the pictures on its walls, presents a monument of the genius of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, whose name Posterity will not willingly let die.

LIFE IN RUSSIA.—SEE NEXT PAGE,

THE NEW IRISH CARDINAL.

Archbishop McCabe, who has been made a Cardinal by Pope Leo XIII., is son of Mr. William Bernard McCabe, a well-known London journalist, who wrote the "Catholic History of England," and whom we recollect as belonging to the Parliamentary staff of the Morning Herald. Edward McCabe, the prelate who has just attained this high ecclesiastical rank, was born in Dublin, and was educated at Maynooth College. He early gained the notice and confidence of the late Cardinal Archbishop Cullen, whom he assisted, first as secretary, afterwards, when parish priest of Kingstown, as a member of the Chapter of Dublin, and as one of the Vicars General. When, in 1877, Cardinal Cullen visited Rome to celebrate the Jubilee of Pius IX., he was suddenly stricken with illness. He consented to the appointment of an assistant, and named Dr. McCabe, who had been made a prelate with the title of Monsignor. Pius IX. accordingly appointed him Assistant Bishop on June 25, 1877. The consecration of the new Bishop took place in his parish chapel at Kingstown on July 23 following, Cardinal Cullen officiating as consecrating prelate, and a large number of the Irish Bishops and superior clergy assisting. From the period of the elevation of Monsignor McCabe to the Episcopate, Cardinal Cullen almost ceased to interfere in the mere ecclesiastical administration of the metropolitan diocese, and concerned himself chiefly with the matters of an Irish Catholic policy. In the direction of University Colleges, charitable institutions, and parochial matters, Bishop McCabe took the chief part, and thus came in contact with the clergy of the diocese and the religious Orders. On the death of Cardinal Cullen, the administration of the Archdiocese fell into the hands of Bishop McCabe, pending the election of a successor to the Archbishopric. At the meeting of the clergy of the Chapter the auxiliary Bishop was returned to Rome as dignissimus. It was only in March, 1879, that the Pontiff determined to accept the nomination of the Chapter, and appoint Bishop McCabe. On May 3, 1879, the Most Rev. Edward McCabe was formally enthroned in the Archiepiscopal chair, and received the homage of the Chapter of the Diocese. The new Archbishop had hitherto never delivered a political speech. Early, however, in his career as Archbishop the Land League was formed, and he has published two pastorals warning his people against the principles of the League. But his chief utterances have been on educational questions, claiming for Catholics a share proportionate to other members in the Irish educational endowments. He is a member of the Senate of the Royal University of Ireland, and takes a constant share in its deliberations. On Sunday last, at Rome, the new Cardinal was formally installed as Protector of the Church of Santa Sabina, in that city. Every member of the College of Cardinals has the titular and honorary charge of one of the numerous parish churches in Rome. The ceremony was attended by the head of the Order of Dominicans, and by the Rector of the Irish College at Rome, who presented addresses of congratulation. Many of the English and Irish Catholic residents or visitors to Rome were present.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI.

We have already recorded the untimely death of this poet and painter, whose influence, though little under public observation, at least in painting, has been considerable through the pseudo-medieval, romantic, and "sensuous" school in contemporary English art and literature. Mr. Rossetti was born in London in May, 1828, and was a son of Gabriel Rossetti, the commentator on Dante, also himself a poet, who had come to England as a refugee after the Neapolitan revolution in 1821. This son made some very precocious attempts both in poetry and painting; and subsequently was for a short time a student at the Royal Academy. He did not, however, enter the "life school," and his imperfect early training in art technicalities remained apparent throughout his career, at least as regards draughtsmanship. His sympathies (naturally from his parentage) were from the first directed to mediævalism; but in his earliest works there was some of that reference to nature in disregard of academic and conventional traditions which has been claimed to be the distinctive characteristic of pre-Raphaelitism. The term, we need hardly now say, was a misnomer. The reaction thirty years and more ago against meaningless conventionality and Academicism was very wide-spread, both in literature and art, at home and abroad, and the pre-Raphaelite "brotherhood" were but the exaggerated expression of it. The historical pre-Raphaelites had no Academicism to explode, and they perfected art not by reference to nature alone, but also by due recognition and adoption of the intellectual and imaginative conventions necessary to the very existence of art. Mr. Rossetti worked for some time in the studio of Mr. Madox Brown, his senior by some years, and the archaeological tastes (though not the realistic tendency) of Mr. Brown harmonised with his own. But soon Mr. Rossetti's all-absorbing aim was to the mystical, the spiritual and poetic; while his scheme of colouring was gradually formed on that of the later Venetian school. His earliest manner was shown in the "Girlhood of Mary," with one exception the only picture ever exhibited by the artist in London, as he always had a settled aversion to submit his works to public criticism. We have glanced at the influences which developed pre-Raphaelitism, because Mr. Rossetti became one of the original members of the brotherhood; the others being the painter's brother, Mr. W. M. Rossetti, the critic, and editor of their organ "The Germ;" Messrs. Millais, Holman Hunt, Woolner, G. F. Stevens, the art critic, and the late Mr. Collinson. It has been erroneously stated that Mr. Madox Brown was also of the number: he did not join them, for the reason that he disapproved of cliques and coteries in art. Of these, all the artists soon departed from the principles they had laid down for their guidance, if extreme and exact realism was one of them, with the exception of Mr. Holman Hunt. Indeed, there is absolutely nothing in common between the works of Mr. Rossetti and Mr. Holman Hunt, unless it be a love of symbolism. The wall-paintings by Mr. Rossetti in the Oxford Union should be named both as early productions, and as having probably influenced Mr. Burne Jones and Mr. William Morris, both of whom were undergraduates at Oxford. Mr. Burne Jones has obviously derived his colouring, and the type of his female faces, from Mr. Rossetti. The fancy of the one is far more fertile; but the imagination of the other seems to have been deeper as well as more original. The one is prolific; the other was a very slow producer, often keeping pictures and poems in hand, emending and completing them, for years. The worship of Dante was hereditary with the subject of this notice, and from the "Vita Nuova," especially, was derived some of his finest pictorial themes. His most important work of this class is the large picture of Dante's vision of the dead Beatrice, recently purchased by the Liverpool Corporation. As it is proposed to shortly hold an exhibition of the painter's works we reserve detailed criticism. It may here be remarked, however, that, alike from the nature of their subjects and treatment, they cannot be popular. Mystical and symbolical representations of unfamiliar poetry and out-of-the-way legends will interest only the romantic initiated. The one unvarying type of female beauty—with matted masses of hair shading eyes full of love-lorn languor; emaciated cheeks and jaws, protruding upper lip, and nether lip retracted as by in-drawn sighing; long crane neck, and generally an expression of febrile and morbid rather than healthy "potentialities of passion"—will, indeed, be an offence to many. As a colourist, the artist presents perhaps the truest claim to admiration, though he but imitates the Venetians. He has been compared to Tintoretto: but seeing that the English artist's works have none of the robust vigour of colour and effect, without a trace of the free, decisive handling of that mighty master of both form and colour, the comparison is most unfortunate. Mr. Rossetti had undoubtedly the peculiar "personality" of genius; hence his influence on congenial minds; but in art his works rather suggest possibilities than assert themselves as actual achievements of enduring and general acceptance.

As a poet in words, Mr. Rossetti is far better known: his gifts are here more apparent, though they have been much contested, and his fame will probably be more lasting. Of his merits in this respect it will not be necessary to dwell, as we have recently endeavoured to do justice to them in these columns. Here, again, some of his earliest efforts were inspired by Dante. In 1861 he published a collection of translations of early Italian poems, including Dante's "Vita Nuova," which was reissued in 1874 under the title of "Dante and his Circle." In 1870 was published his first volume of original "Poems." That these evinced imaginative power, if fantastic, sensuous, and narrow, in range of sympathy; and also much constructive art, if laboured, artificial, and affected, was generally admitted. The artist-recluse, such as he was known in painting, was seen again at work—living in and borrowing from the vague and mystic past, limning the picturesque aspects of things, and elaborating all to a consciously artistic result, overwrought by fevered or hypochondriac analysis of emotions and sentiments. Spontaneity, sense of actuality, and the simple directness of passions or emotions felt, not merely recalled, or dreamt of and submitted to dilettanti examination, were deficient. It was ten years before Mr. Rossetti published his second volume of poems—the "Ballads and Sonnets," recently reviewed, some of which are greatly in advance of his preceding compositions in verse.

THE NEW FRENCH AMBASSADOR.

The appointment of M. Tissot to supersede M. Challemlacour as Minister of the French Republic in London is generally attributed to M. Gambetta's thinking it desirable that a poet of so much importance should be intrusted to an experienced member of the French diplomatic service, not to a clever political journalist of the last Revolution. M. Tissot has been constantly employed in the regular consular and diplomatic business of France during thirty-two years, and has steadily worked his way upward from the lowest to the highest degree of official preferment. He has resided, as the consular agent of the French Government, successively at Corunna and Salonica, at Tunis, at Adrianople, and at Jassy, in Moldavia; he was also engaged on a special mission in Herzegovina and Montenegro; and he has since been the diplomatic representative of his country in Morocco, in Greece, and at Constantinople. Under the Empire, in 1863, while Consul at Jassy, he furnished to M. de Lavalette, then Special Envoy to Constantinople, valuable reports on the state of the Danubian Principalities; and, when M. de Lavalette afterwards became Minister of Foreign Affairs in Paris, he called M. Tissot to assist him in the political business of the Department. In 1869, M. Tissot came to London, as First Secretary to the French Embassy here; and upon the fall of the Empire, in September, 1870, he remained in London as Chargé d'Affaires. But when, after the peace in 1871, the French Republican Government, under M. Thiers, sent a new Ambassador to London, M. Tissot went as Minister to Tangiers. In 1876, he was transferred to Athens, where he gained much favour with the Greeks, and two years ago he was promoted to the Embassy at Constantinople. It is understood that Madame la Comtesse Le Peletier d'Aunay, wife of the First Secretary to the Embassy in London, will act as presiding lady at the drawing-room receptions held by M. Tissot, during his residence here as accredited Minister of the Court of Great Britain.

THE FUNERAL OF LONGFELLOW.

On Sunday, the 26th ult., in the beautiful Mount Auburn Cemetery, adjacent to the city of Boston, the mortal remains of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, a scholar and English poet as much beloved and esteemed in the Old Country as in the New, were committed to their final earthly resting-place. They were brought from Longfellow's dwelling, Craigie House, in the classic suburb of Cambridge; an old-fashioned mansion which belongs to American history, as it was in July, 1775, and during some months afterwards, the temporary residence and headquarters of General Washington, while engaged in beleaguering the British garrison of Boston during the War of Independence. Among the company of invited friends were Richard H. Dana, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John Greenleaf Whittier, Oliver Wendell Holmes, William Dean Howells, Alexander Agassiz, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, President Eliot of Harvard College, Bronson Alcott, and George William Curtis. On the plain coffin lay a spray of passion flowers. Everything was studiously simple. Hundreds of people followed the bier to Harvard University, where the brief funeral services were read, in the Appleton Chapel. Nearly one thousand persons were present, and many could not find room. The family were absent from the chapel. Professor Everett's address was not an elaborate eulogy, but a brief and simple memorial of a neighbour, a townsman, and a friend, who was also a poet, rather than a poet merely. Some passages were delivered with quiet pathos, but without any attempt at oratory, to a tearful and sympathetic audience. The day was recognised formally in every church in Cambridge, and by many in Boston, and in other cities of the United States. At the grave in Mount Auburn Cemetery stood, on one side, Longfellow's two sons and two daughters, with his brother, the Rev. Mr. Longfellow, who read the concluding part of the funeral service; at the other side, his personal friends and literary associates, Emerson and Wendell Holmes being two of the most distinguished. Our Illustrations are from Sketches by Mr. G. W. Yass, of Boston.

Mr. Edward Shiel, who represented Athlone in the last Parliament, has been returned for the county of Meath without opposition, in succession to Mr. A. M. Sullivan, who has retired from Parliamentary life.

In a few of our earliest printed copies last week the Engravings on pages 368-9 of the Easter Volunteer Review were transposed. The Illustration at the top shows the Artists' Corps advancing to the attack; the second showing the Western Division moving on Portsdown Hill.

NAVAL AND SUBMARINE ENGINEERING.

The Exhibition opened at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, on Easter Monday, under the patronage of the Institution of Naval Architects, the Admiralty, Lloyd's Shipping Register, the Institution of Civil Engineers, and other scientific or official authorities, was closed this week. It was visited daily by several thousand persons of superior intelligence, many of whom belonged to the classes practically acquainted with the objects to be secured by such contrivances and apparatus—namely, improvements in steam and hydraulic machinery, in marine engines and boilers, and in propellers, ships' scientific instruments, the employment of steel in ships' pumping machinery, electric lighting of ships, boat-lowering apparatus; the appliances of docks, dredging, and diving, and of wreck-raising; submarine boats, refrigerating apparatus, and the means of preventing or repairing accidents to machinery at sea. Lectures upon these subjects were delivered every day, in Berners Hall, to very attentive audiences, by the authors of approved inventions, or by other persons having special knowledge of the particular matter. Our Illustrations represent some of the means devised for saving life at sea, and for raising shipwrecked vessels. The Self-Launching Bridge Life-Raft, exhibited by Mr. R. Roper, of 143, Lewisham-high-road, New Cross, is here shown attached to the midship section of a large ocean-going steam-ship, ready for being launched into the water, as was done with the model at the Agricultural Hall. It is fitted with mast, sails, oars, compass, and seats, which also serve to hold fresh water and provisions. This raft can be used as a bridge, or gangway, for landing or embarking troops, horses, guns, or baggage. The Sea-Messenger, patented by Messrs. Rednap and Penhry, of Twickenham, who call it "the Avalanche," is a buoy carrying a mast and a flag, and made visible at night with luminous paint, in which mail-bags, letters, or valuable articles of property can be placed for safety, to be picked up by some passing ship, or to be seen and fetched by boats. Evans' and Low's Patent gun, exhibited by Messrs. Low and Duff, of the Albert Machine Works, Dundee, may be used, either on shore or on board ship, being easily portable, for shooting lines to or from a vessel in distress, as is done by Mauby's Rocket Apparatus. Messrs. Clark and Standfield, of 4, Broad Sanctuary, and 8, Westminster Chambers, Victoria-street, also of the Crown Works, Guildford-street, York-road, Lambeth, have recently given practical demonstrations of the merits of their contrivance for raising sunken ships. The difficulty, indeed, seems to be not so much that of lifting, but that of taking hold of the vessel, so as not to damage it by the cutting effects of the chain-anchors, or other attachments, hitherto used. These, too, can only be used in the smooth water of rivers and harbours, as there must be an equal strain on the slings to lift the vessel successfully. The Self-Adjusting Gripping Camels, devised and constructed by Messrs. Clark and Standfield, consist each of a large buoyant domed cylinder, fixed above a transverse pontoon girder, to lie across the vessel which is to be raised, with two wedge-shaped arms, or rather jaws, which are hinged to the girder, hanging down on each side; these jaws, or claws, are fitted on their inner faces with an ingenious gripping apparatus, formed of a jointed curtain of steel links or chains, with thick bags of canvas, india-rubber, and rope network, to protect the sides of the ship when gripped, as in a vice, by the jaws fastening upon it; the dome or cylinder above, when filled with air, can raise a weight of 270 tons by its buoyancy; and a sufficient number of these machines, along the hull of the sunken ship, will be able to raise it to the surface. Messrs. Hill and Clark, of 6, Westminster Chambers, have already gained official approval for their boat-lowering apparatus, by which the boat releases itself as soon as it floats on the water, and one end cannot become detached without the other; this apparatus has been used by the Admiralty, and by some of the great Steamship Companies, during ten years past. The Collapsible or folding-up portable Boats, invented by the Rev. E. L. Berthon, have been described and illustrated in this Journal upon former occasions; they are so light, and can be packed up in so small a compass, that every passenger-ship might easily carry enough of them to hold all the persons on board; and a boat 22 ft. long, 7 ft. 4 in. wide, can be unfolded, fixed, and lowered from the ship, by two men, in less than one minute. The Whitby Life-Buoy, invented by Mr. Robert Whitby, of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich, has been adopted for Government service; it is shown in our Illustration, being a floating ring of 35 in. diameter, made in eight water-tight compartments filled with air, and having a chain suspended beneath to support the man's feet. This buoy will, in fact, support four men at once, it is fitted with two signal-lights, a strong whistle, and a bottle of brandy, whereby the poor fellow may keep himself alive and hope to be rescued in an hour or two. For the rescue of large numbers, in case of such a disaster as that of the Princess Alice on the Thames near Woolwich, the patent Life-Buoy Seats, combined with a furniture of fire-buckets, cork life-belts, and buoys for sea-messengers, which Mr. R. Rose, of 72, Leadenhall-street, has designed, would seem likely to be effectual. They might well be carried on board the crowded river steamers, though perhaps not equally suitable for seagoing ships.

SKETCHES OF LIFE IN RUSSIA.

Easter festivities among the Russian people, as we have already observed, are still kept up with a great exhibition of characteristic modes of providing for the entertainment of all classes; not only by the sale of Easter cakes, Easter eggs, curds and sweetmeats, and of various articles of personal and household decoration, but also by shows resembling those formerly to be seen at the Easter Fair held in many an English country town. The Sketches by our Artist, Mr. Schönberg, presented this week, include that of the scene outside a booth in which there is a Panorama, or some attractive spectacle of that sort. We can discern, among the canvas paintings of the exterior, such figures as St. George and the Dragon, the Great Sea Serpent, or else a Whale, in conflict with a Ship, and a ferocious Bear carrying off a Child from its distracted Mother. And there are the managers, one cap in hand, inviting customers to enter, the other with a trumpet now and then sounding his loud signal that the show is ready to begin. Jewish dealers in the old-clothes' market, a pedlar with his portable stand and tray, a basket-maker carrying his wares on a barrow, figure as the subjects of minor Sketches; and the old-fashioned Russian costume is illustrated by the drawing of a peculiar head-dress, as well as by the garb of the true Muscovite standing at the provision-dealer's stall, in the upper corner of the page.

Our Portrait of the Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin is from a photograph by G. Borelli, of Rome; that of M. Tissot, the new French Ambassador, from one by Abdullah Brothers, of Constantinople; that of the late Mr. Dante Rossetti, from one by Messrs. W. and D. Downey, of Ebury-street; and that of the late General Causton, from one by Mr. Spink, of Brighton.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

Mr. Robert Buchanan has publicly announced that he is not wholly responsible for the dramatic version of his novel "The Shadow of the Sword" that has been advertised and announced as his work by the management of the Olympic Theatre. He showed a drama on the subject to Mr. John Coleman, a well-known actor and one of the best stage managers living, who was permitted by the author largely to remodel and rewrite the play. This permission having been given, Mr. Buchanan does not appear to have approved of Mr. Coleman's work. He objects to a curse in the second act; and he has an apparent horror of the conventional "stage peasant." What Mr. Buchanan's play would have been without Mr. Coleman's alterations it is not for me to say, as I have had no opportunity of comparing the two works; but I submit that the novelist exhibited great good sense in seeking the advice and profiting by the experience of so old a stage manager as Mr. Coleman. Authors are not always the best judges of stage effect, nor do they conscientiously study the spirit of the dramatic times. If they were occasionally less sensitive to correction they would be more successful. Many of the most valuable theatrical properties of modern days have been made so by the experienced advice of the stage manager, who has not hesitated to eliminate beautiful though pointless dialogue, and to remodel ineffective scenes. It has been said that literary actors make the best dramatists; it is certain that they avoid the pitfalls into which the purely literary dramatist occasionally falls. All who are familiar with Mr. Buchanan's admirable work, who know his bold, nervous songs, and have followed the course of his poetical prose, will quite understand his desire to make out of "The Shadow of the Sword" a purely idyllic drama, after the fashion of "L'Ami Fritz." But the experiment would have been a very dangerous one. The charming play by M.M. Erckmann-Chatrian would never have succeeded in this country, where on the stage, in the present condition of public taste, the purely idyllic is voted wearisome. Gems like "Olivia" and "The Squire" succeeded because they had strong stories superadded to their inherent poetry. When Mr. Hardy dramatised his own most poetical novel, he made it very like a melodrama. The play-going public differs from the reading public, and so, I hold, Mr. Coleman was perfectly right in introducing the curse of the concept, which is one of the most striking dramatic moments of the play, and equally right in introducing the stage peasant, who, at any rate, relieves the composition from a monotony of gloom. The cause of the ill-success of this play is, however, quite outside Mr. Buchanan's work or Mr. Coleman's alterations. The London public is accustomed to a more harmonious style of art. They patronise and applaud what is very good, but they refuse to scatter a shower of gold over mediocrity. I trust that I have explained all this without temper or offence. Mr. Robert Buchanan appears to be very angry with "London dramatic critics," and to consider them, one and all, incapable of civility or fair play. He invited them to see his plays of "Lucy Brandon" and the "Shadow of the Sword," and because they could not conscientiously recommend those works they have incurred the author's displeasure, as they incur the displeasure of everyone with whose work they disagree. This is inevitable, and is the outcome of a disagreeable duty. Of the two plays, I myself prefer "The Shadow of the Sword," but I wish that both could have been so successful as to encourage Mr. Buchanan to continue writing for the stage. His is just the temperament for dramatic writing, and just the pen that the stage requires.

The component parts of modern melodrama are romance and reality. Two distinct orders of mind have to be satisfied, and pleasure must be given to those who exercise their imagination as well as those who can derive no enjoyment except from the actualities of life presented with a pre-Raphaelite exactness. In these days we must have chivalry and costermongers, deeds of daring and degraded desperation, lovers of Arcadia and loafers of Whitechapel. Incongruity, instead of being a disadvantage, is a recommendation in a modern play of variety and action. Who, for instance, would have seen any connection between Grace Darling, the heroic daughter of the lighthouse-keeper on Longstone, one of the Farne Islands, and the two dreadful actors in a modern, grim, and dreadful tragedy that was enacted in Northumberland-street, Strand, in the month of July, 1861. What was the story of the brave girl who saved nine of the crew of the wrecked Forfarshire steamer in 1838 to do with that vulgar scene of horror close by Charing-cross Station, when an officer in the Army—Major Murray—and a money-lender, one Roberts, belaboured one another with tongs, champagne-bottles, metal vases, and every available missile until one died outright and the other had barely strength enough to go to the window and babble for help. It was the old story—cherches la femme!—a woman was at the bottom of it, and the jealous money-lender wanted to put the successful officer out of the way. The task of sewing these two disjointed scraps of dramatic action and sensation together has been satisfactorily accomplished by Mr. Hugh Marston and Mr. Leonard Rae in a new drama called "Humanity," recently produced, with considerable success, at that fine theatre "down east," called The Standard. In this romance of life we have not only the Grace Darling episode and the dread details of the Northumberland-street tragedy, but a dim suggestion of our old friend the Tichborne case, which arises in the person of one Joshua Langley, an adventurer who comes over from Australia to claim and possess the Edendale estates. The real heiress is however, Grace Darling, the persecuted heroine, who suffers untold misery at the hands of the false Lord Edendale and his accomplice, a polished scamp, called Carlo Silvani. The drama advances by progressive stages of interest. Grace Darling, going out in a small boat on a stormy sea, saves her lover from drowning and secures the documents proving her claim to her property. Her innocence of all the charges of petty larceny forced upon her character is clearly established, and nothing remains to be done but to administer poetical justice to the two villains, Lord Edendale and Silvani, who have both loved and married the same woman. It is the end of the play, and these two Kilkenny cats must be disposed of; so the authors follow the ugly precedent of the Strand tragedy of 1861 with an exactness and fidelity that are almost appalling. If the last scene in the "Lights o' London" and in this play of "Humanity" are samples of the simple pleasures of the people, we must be developing a strange taste for bloodthirstiness. The free fight of the costers and roughs in the first play was sufficiently tinged with horror; but this domestic tragedy is far worse. No detail is spared. The scene is elaborated with painful fidelity. The duel to the death begins with pistols, proceeds to tongs, poker, vases, plates, and champagne bottles. Windows are smashed with chair legs, the two men fight to the top of a rickety staircase, and fall down with a crash, their faces are smeared with blood, and the curtain falls upon a wreck of furniture and humanity. The scene, if it can be said to belong to the province of art, was at least well done; and the drama has the advantage of the assistance of Mr. Arthur Dacre, a fine manly young actor, who takes the part of Carlo Silvani, and fights Mr. Edward Sass with a desperation that must be highly satisfactory to the new realistic disciples of the "blood and thunder" school. Mr. J. A. Arnold, a capital actor of character, and Mr. Ernest Wilmore, a clever low comedian, also distinguished themselves. C. S.

The Easter novelties at the Philharmonic Theatre, Islington, continue to attract large audiences. "Night Birds," the work of Messrs. G. L. Gordon and Joseph Mackay, is a melodrama of a pronounced conventional type, in which virtue is oppressed by vice through five long acts and eventually triumphs at the fall of the curtain. The moralities being thus propitiated in the result, it is perhaps unnecessary, it would certainly be unpleasant, to dwell upon the means by which the end is attained. We may observe, however, that it is possible to point the moral that honesty is the best policy without introducing honesty to scenes where that quality is rarely found and never retained for any length of time. The whole of the third act is objectionable in this respect, and its excision would greatly improve the piece. The drama is followed by a burlesque called "De Lights of London," in which three hands have been employed to travestie Mr. G. R. Sims's popular play, the trio of authors being M.M. Wallis Mackay, Lennard, and Gordon. The songs in this trifle are happily conceived, and are excellently sung by Miss Emily Nichols as Bess, Miss Lindon as Harold Armytage, and Miss De Wyndale as Philosopher Jack.

The Moore and Burgess Minstrels set forth a holiday programme, abounding in those hilarious buffo songs, quaint jokes, tunelessly rendered choruses, and humorous burlesques, for which this famous troupe has long been renowned at St. James's Hall. With quip and song, Mr. G. W. Moore, Prince of "bones," provides a merry and varied entertainment, wherein the practical jokes of "Mrs. Simpson's Ball" and "Jumbo and Elephant William" are relieved by such harmoniously sung ditties as "The sheep-bells on the hill," and "Birds and Blossoms," and "Oh! Barney, come back to me!" Sir Henry Bishop's fine chorus, "The Halt of the Caravan," is another praiseworthy feature of the Easter programme.

MUSIC.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

We have already given a summary of the prospectus of the arrangements for the new season at this establishment, and have now to record the opening thereof on Tuesday evening. As usual on a first night, the opera chosen was a familiar one; in this case Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" having been selected, with a cast similar to that of previous occasions, Madame Fursch-Madi was the Valentine, Madame Alwina Valleria Margherita di Valois, and Madame Trebelli the page Urbano; three excellent representatives of those characters; other principal parts having also been effectively filled, especially those of Raoul di Nangis by Signor Mierzewsky, Conte di San Bris by Signor De Reszke, Conte di Nevers by Signor Cotogni, and Marcello by Signor Gresse. The lady first named sang and acted with fine effect, notwithstanding that she was suffering from a cold, for which an apology was made. In the important duet with Marcello in the Pré aux Clercs, and still more in the conspiracy scene and the grand duet with Raoul (at the end of the fourth act), with which the opera now generally terminates, Madame Fursch-Madi produced a marked impression. Signor Mierzewsky's resonant voice and high chest notes were most effectively displayed in the duet-septet and the great duet with Valentine; in which latter, especially, he sang with genuine dramatic feeling. As on previous occasions, Madame Valleria gave the florid music of her part with fluent and brilliant execution, and the Page's songs were charmingly rendered by Madame Trebelli. The other three characters were also excellently sustained; Signor Gresse's voice having apparently gained in power since his debut here last season, as evidenced in his very effective delivery of the chorale, and "Piff-paff" song in the first act, and in Marcello's share of the duet with Valentine. The orchestra—with Mr. Carrodus as leading violinist—was in every way worthy of the reputation of the establishment, and the chorus was generally satisfactory, fully so in the great scene of the benediction of the poniards. Signor Bevignani conducted with the practised skill and care which he has manifested here for several past seasons. The National Anthem was given, by chorus and orchestra, before the opera. For Thursday, "Lucia di Lammermoor" was announced, with the return of Madame Sembrich as Lucia; and for this (Saturday) evening "Faust" was promised, with the first appearances of Mdlle. Olga Berghi and M. Bouhy, respectively, as Margherita and Méphistofele.

The formation of the Royal Italian Opera Company (Limited), projected some time ago, is now proceeding, the lamented death of Mr. Frederick Gye having rendered necessary the realisation and division of his estate among his family. The scheme is a comprehensive one, comprising operatic and concert performances in the Royal Italian Opera House, the Floral Hall, Her Majesty's Theatre, and in the provinces and America. The capital of the company is £200,000, and this will effect the purchase of all the properties and interests associated with the establishments above referred to. A very important feature is the appointment of Mr. Ernest Gye as managing director, an office for which he is eminently qualified by business aptitude and the valuable experience gained during a part of his father's career and since. The engagement of Mr. Mapleson to superintend the operatic business in the United States is also a valuable point in the arrangements, this gentleman having had great and special experience on that ground. For financial details the carefully prepared prospectus issued should be consulted.

The Crystal Palace Saturday Afternoon Concerts were resumed last week, after one week's interruption. The programme included the first performance here of a new Piano-forte Concerto composed by Herr Eduard Schütt, a young Russian, who completed his musical studies at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and has recently settled at Vienna. The work consists of three divisions—"Allegro Energico" in G minor, "Moderato Assai" in B flat, and "Allegro Grazioso" in G major. It is well written for the display of the principal instrument, to which are assigned many brilliant bravura passages, with others in a pleasingly melodious style. The orchestral writing is also varied and effective, the work generally being less vague and incoherent than is the case with many productions of the new German school. The concerto, altogether, is full of promise as the production of so young a composer. Mr. H. Blower made a highly successful first appearance at these concerts, and was deservedly applauded in Handel's air, "O, ruddier than the cherry," his other song having been Schubert's "The Wanderer." Madame Sinico also contributed effective vocal performances, the remainder of the programme calling for no specific notice. A new symphony by Anton Dvorak is to be given for the first time here at this week's concert.

Mr. Gunz's new series of concerts at St. James's Hall begins this (Saturday) afternoon, the dates of the remaining performances being May 6 and 20, June 3 and 17.

The concert at the Royal Albert Hall this (Saturday) afternoon is to include the novel feature of a performance of the music of the garden scene from "Faust," with the singers in the costumes of the respective characters; Madame Christine Nilsson as Marguerite, Madame Trebelli as Siebel, Mr. Maas as Faust, and Signor Foli as Méphistopheles.

Signor Machiavelli (vocalist) gave a soirée musicale at the Beethoven Rooms on Tuesday evening, when he was assisted by several eminent performers, vocal and instrumental.

A concert, supported by eminent artists, was given at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening, in aid of that deserving institution, the Covent Garden Life-Boat Fund.

The Schubert Society gave the second concert of their sixteenth season at the Langham Hall on Thursday evening.

Madame Sophie Menter, the renowned pianist, will give a recital at St. James's Hall next Monday afternoon, and a second on May 5.

Mr. Oscar Beringer's fifth annual recital is to take place next Wednesday afternoon at St. James's Hall.

The second of this year's concerts of the Bach Society takes place next Wednesday evening, with a programme of a purely classical nature.

The Philharmonic Society's concert of Thursday next will possess special interest, as it will bring forward—for the first time in England—Rubinstein's cantata, "Paradise Lost."

Madame Pinart will give a matinée musicale on Thursday afternoon, May 4, at Steinway Hall.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The Newmarket Craven Meeting seldom passes over without bringing about some changes in the quotations on future events, and it was not, therefore, surprising last week to see Paragon emerge from obscurity, and take a prominent place in the betting on the Two Thousand, whilst, at one time, Kingdom became nearly as good a favourite as Bruce for the Derby. These two horses came into notice through their performances during the early part of the week, and the result of one or two events that were decided on the Thursday and Friday was not without its influence on the future. Though there was a field of nine for the Craven Stakes, this event really looked at the mercy of Marden, who was opposed by a very ragged lot indeed. He seemed to be winning easily some distance from home, but little Laureate stuck gamely to him, and managed to do him by a short head. Like his own brother, The Abbot, Marden has a most heart-breaking knack of running second; but, whilst the former was generally defeated from having the ill-luck to meet something a little too good for him, the latter is, we fear, a rogue, and loses his races through not having the heart to struggle. Laureate, who disappointed his party in the Middle Park Plate last season, is a splendidly-bred horse, being by Rosicrucian from Laura, the dam of Lemnos, Fraulein, Petrarch, &c.; but he is rather wanting in size and length, and neither he nor Marden need be thought of in connection with the great events of the year. Fiddler galloped right away from Great Carle and Soltkyoff over the D.I., and thus made some amends for his Northampton defeats. Ten runners furnished material for a very interesting race in the International Handicap, and Barbe Bleue (6 st. 11 lb.) scored such an easy victory that he may be regarded as a fair outsider for the Derby. Amongst the beaten lot were Spring Tide (8 st. 5 lb.), Guthrum (7 st.), Incendiary (8 st. 4 lb.), and Mistake (8 st. 11 lb.), all of them useful animals; and the son of Bolard made such an example of them that he may be equal to winning a race or two in far better company. The uncertain Corky did not at all relish being called upon for the third time in four days, and ran all over the course in a Biennial Plate, a bad example that was followed by Merinos; so Myra was left to win at her leisure. After her defeat by Pebble, Petticoat was scarcely so good a favourite as Tyndrum in a Private Sweepstakes over five furlongs of the Abingdon Mile; still she had little trouble in beating the son of Blue Gown, who did not finish very generously.

The card on the opening day at Epsom was not a very interesting one, and, though the rings were well filled, we never saw fewer people present on the hill on a Metropolitan day. Lord Rosebery secured a Maiden Plate with a very fashionably-bred filly by Macaroni—Bonnie Agnes; and then a poor field of seven turned out for the Great Surrey Handicap. Old Chevrone (9 st.) ran as well as he always does over this course, but could not quite concede the required weight to Leeds (6 st. 10 lb.). Five runners made up a very poor field for the Metropolitan, which was little less than a gift for Fiddler (7 st. 11 lb.), the unlucky Prudhomme (7 st. 7 lb.), who has been hurdle-racing during the winter, proving the best of the remainder; whilst Brown Bess (7 st. 5 lb.), who scored such an unexpected victory in this event last year, was third. The best field of the day was brought together for the Westminster Stakes, which was at first regarded as a match between Alfonso and Pebble. Soon, however, a "dark" filly by Speculum—Gardenia, in Lord Rosebery's stable, was so heavily backed that she was decidedly favourite at the fall of the flag, and eventually won very easily indeed. Alfonso made some sort of a fight with her, and finished second; but Pebble cut up so badly that his defeat of Petticoat last week must be regarded as a fluke.

In spite of a change for the worse in the weather, there was an immense attendance on the Downs on Wednesday, and the sport showed great improvement on that which had been provided on the previous day. Chevrone (9 st. 12 lb.) repeated his victory of last year in the Stamford Plate, and then the chief interest centred in the paddock, where the City and Suburban candidates were being prepared for the fray. The field only numbered fourteen, by far the smallest number that have taken part in the race since 1857, when only thirteen came to the post. There was little or no change in the betting prior to the start, which took place at the second attempt, and all calculations were upset by the easy victory of Passaic (6 st. 7 lb.), a cast-off from Mr. Lorillard's stable, who was followed home by Master Waller (7 st. 8 lb.) and Scobell (8 st. 2 lb.), the last-named of whom seriously interfered with Master Waller, or Mr. Crawford's colt might have made an even better fight of it. The Hyde Park Plate went to the highly-tried Rookery, a daughter of Hampton, and Archer had an extraordinary day, being apparently invincible in the minor events.

A correspondent of the Times states that out of the eighty Brethren of the Charter House there are fourteen gentlemen who are upwards of eighty-three years of age.

The Lords of the Admiralty have sanctioned the expenditure of £400 for the erection of a gymnasium in connection with the Royal Naval Barracks, Sheerness.

A new public abattoir of Dublin was opened last week by the Lord Mayor and Corporation in statu. The Lord Mayor, in commemoration of the event, was presented with a gold key.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Over Ireland still hangs the one black cloud, which darkens the United Kingdom. It filled Parliament with gloom when the Houses broke up for the Easter Recess; kept Mr. Forster busily occupied in Dublin, and the Prime Minister and his other colleagues ingloriously mute in England; caused even the Leaders of the Opposition to speak with 'bated breath' in Liverpool last week; and remained undisputed when the House of Commons reassembled on Monday, and the House of Lords on Thursday, after the holidays. Murder yet stalks abroad in Ireland. Lawlessness is uncurbed. It behoves all classes of men who would see this agrarian crime suppressed to strengthen the hands of the Government at this deplorable juncture.

Mr. Gladstone, who hid his anxiety beneath a show of cheerfulness, typified by the flower he wore in his button-hole, was not in his seat in time on Monday to reply to any of the Irish questions; and when the Premier paid the dark-browed irreconcilable, Mr. Healy, the compliment of crossing the floor to address a few words to him privately, it was thought the right hon. gentleman did so to personally express his regret for his absence to the hon. member. With this act of courtesy on the part of the Leader of the House to Mr. Parnell's bitterest free-lance, and with the liberation of Mr. Parnell himself from Kilmallick on parole, it undeniably looked as if the Ministry were, at any rate, prepared on their side to hold out the olive-branch to the Home Rule members.

Mr. Sexton, the best of Mr. Parnell's debaters, was to prove himself the obdurate one of his Party, however. The hon. member, first opposing progress of the Army Bill in Committee on the score of the military's proclivity for seizing cars in Ireland rather arbitrarily, next made himself the champion of the soldier's wife. In this chivalrous capacity Mr. Sexton, unwisely seemingly that the wedding bells should ring for naught in the Army, wished to insert a new clause rendering it more binding on Tommy Atkins to maintain his wife and children. Mr. Childers promised the matter should be looked into. But Mr. Sexton found some Radical support. On a division, the amendment was, nevertheless, defeated by 116 to 49 votes; and the Army Bill was then reported.

The "Fourth Party" has been temporarily dislocated since the illness of Lord Randolph Churchill. Mr. Chaplin has now and again shown a partiality for his advantageous seat on the corner of the front bench below the gangway. Deprived of their dashing leader, Mr. Gorst and Sir H. Drummond Wolff no longer habitually sit together. The return of the noble Lord (thoroughly restored to health, it is to be hoped, by his trip across the Atlantic) will probably bring the "Fourth Party" together again. We are too much indebted for the enlightenment of debate to Lord Randolph Churchill not to regret his absence, and its cause.

Bravely, though, do the two chief remaining members of the temporarily disrupted "Fourth Party" strive to maintain the credit. Mr. Gorst, to wit, on Monday endeavoured to make the still, small voice of conscience heard with regard to our treatment of Cetewayo. With the name of the ex-King of Zululand on his shield, Mr. Gorst entered the lists, ready to do battle on behalf of his sable client. But there were few to fight. In plainer language, Mr. Gorst moved that an humble address be presented to the Crown praying that Cetewayo should be released from captivity. In argument, the hon. and learned member went further, and advised that the exiled monarch should be reinstated King of the Zulus. Lord Chelmsford displayed his interest in the motion (cordially seconded by Mr. W. Fowler) by occupying a seat in the Peers' Gallery. It was to be gathered from the friendly tone Mr. Gladstone adopted in speaking of Cetewayo (who was "on parole," not in captivity, the Premier maintained) that the whole case of Zululand and the ex-King is being considered by the Government, with a probability that the outcome of the deliberations may be favourable to Cetewayo's claims. Reasonably satisfied with Mr. Gladstone's statement, Mr. Gorst withdrew his motion, and went on his way rejoicing. The danger of fires in the metropolitan theatres and music-halls was the parable next taken up; but Mr. Dixon-Hartland (who paid, in passing, a deserved compliment to Captain Shean for the rules he has framed for extinguishing of fires in places of amusement) could draw from Sir William Harcourt nothing more satisfactory than that the responsibility of ensuring the public safety rested between the Lord Chamberlain's Office and the Metropolitan Board of Works. Finally, on Monday, in Committee, Mr. Childers secured the good round sum of £2,966,000 for provisions for the Army.

His eye ever with a fine frenzy rolling over the horizon in search of any clouds that may be scudding abroad, Sir H. Drummond Wolff may be justly regarded as the ready-made Foreign Secretary of the "Fourth Party." He sought to make good his claim to this position on Tuesday by an animated onslaught on the Government because of their employment of Mr. Errington as a kind of semi-official Ambassador to his Holiness the Pope. But Mr. Gladstone, owning the soft impeachment in so far as Earl Granville actually had requested Mr. Errington to convey to his Holiness some accurate information respecting the state of Ireland, had no difficulty in piercing the airy bubbles Sir Drummond Wolff had blown round a simple and natural proceeding. Perhaps, no stronger proof could be adduced of the satisfactory nature of the Ministerial explanation than the fact that it aroused an earnest protest from Mr. Newdegate, whose increasing solemnity of manner is becoming quite pathetic. Sir J. M'Kenna's prosing about the "unequal incidence of Imperial taxation in Ireland"—an inequality far more noticeable this side of St. George's Channel—gradually emptied the House, which was counted out at an early hour in the evening.

Seeing that the House has been now counted out on seven Tuesdays this Session, and considering that the legislative business of the Government is sadly and unprecedentedly in arrears, it may be admitted that there were grounds for the question Mr. Justin M'Carthy gave notice of on Wednesday—whether the Prime Minister would take steps to keep the House on Tuesdays for important business? Not till after the Budget has been introduced by Mr. Gladstone, on Monday next, will the House be called upon to resume the consideration of the proposed new rules of procedure. As the Closure rule has not yet been sanctioned, except inferentially by the rejection of Mr. Marriott's amendment, the field of discussion threatens to be limitless, unless the leaders on both sides come to some understanding on the point.

Mr. Shiel, the Home Rule member chosen for Meath in place of Michael Davitt, took his seat on Tuesday; and on Wednesday a new writ was ordered for West Somerset, which is in the throes of an election by reason of Major Lee's acceptance of the Chiltern Hundreds. Wednesday was mainly taken up with the second reading (by 95 against 31 votes) of Mr. Leahy's bill to make the elections of guardians in Ireland triennial instead of annual, and the consideration of Mr. Ashton Dilke's Parliamentary Elections Expenses Bill.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, April 18.

Once more my hopes and the hopes of thousands of my fellow-creatures are about to be crowned by a brilliant realisation or blighted by a bitter disappointment. The chances are strongly, overwhelmingly, in favour of their being blighted. However, on Thursday next will take place the public drawing of the lottery of the Dramatic Artists' Society, and some happy mortal will win the gros lot of 100,000*fr.* Meanwhile the speculators in lottery tickets do not seem to have done a good business this time, for during the past two or three days along the boulevards the usual cries of the venders of obscene journals have been varied by the yelping of young Israelites: A tizhuit sous j'ai tes pillets! And then another would chirp in: A tizept sous j'ai quelques pillets! As I came out of the theatre last night I bought a ticket finally at four sous below par, the last of a vender's stock. "If that ticket only won!" said I. "That may well be," remarked my Israelite, "butique c'est le dernier!" The reasoning was not very conclusive; still it was comforting.

A propos of the cries of the venders on the boulevards, the Government has prepared a bill intended to cover offences against decency committed by "writings, printed matter, bills, engravings, paintings, emblems, or images." Of late the boulevards of Paris have been a disgrace to any civilised city, and it is high time that the police should be empowered to interfere. Only now the literary folks are alarmed. The terms of the proposed law are too elastic. "Writings and paintings" is too sweeping. The novelists and poets have a vivid recollection of the manner in which a tribunal treated Baudelaire's "Fleurs du Mal" and Gustave Flaubert's "Madame Bovary." They remember, too, that in a recent case the détournement of the order of advocates characterised Gautier's "Mademoiselle de Maupin" as "a complete treatise of debauchery and libertinage." The novelists and poets do not ask anything better than the suppression of the pornographs, but they protest against investing the magistracy with the right of literary and artistic censorship.

After months, almost after years, of delay M. Ambroise Thomas's new opera, "Françoise de Rimini," was brought out at the Opera on Friday last. On the first night the piece was decidedly not a success. Long, tiresome, uninteresting, no character, such were the verdicts of the critical and blasé audience. Amongst the critics few whose words have any weight have ventured to defend M. Thomas by pleading the science and perfection of his music. The Wagnerians and the partisans of the lyric drama have demonstrated without difficulty that "Françoise de Rimini" is simply a series of airs, duos, trios, symphonic episodes and choruses connected together arbitrarily by a recitative; that the plot of the piece is too ridiculous to bear analysis; that none of the characters hold together; and, in short, that the piece has neither ideas nor dramatic unity. The limits of this letter do not permit me to develop the grounds of these sweeping criticisms; I am simply endeavouring to give the general impression produced by the work. As far as concerns the section of Parisian society known as "tout Paris"—a section which, it must be confessed, carries depreciation often to excess—the opinion about "Françoise de Rimini" is summed up in two words—four complais, total failure. On the other hand, it must be remembered that the same author's "Hamlet" was unanimously pronounced to be long, tiresome, and ridiculous—a fact which does not prevent it from maintaining its place in the repertory. In "Françoise de Rimini" there is an excellent Spanish ballet, the only part of the work whose success is uncontested, thanks to the choreographic skill of Mlle. Rosita Mauri. The prima donna, Mlle. Caroline Salla, whose début was preceded by so much drum-beating, failed to impress favourably a Parisian audience.

Nothing remarkable has happened during the past week in the world of fashion. The steeplechases at the Croix de Berny brought out a few well-appointed coaches, it being considered à la mode to tool down to this meeting. In the afternoon, society has honoured the Concours Hippique with its presence. Never in previous years has the horse show had such success. Every day the vast Palais de l'Industrie was crowded, and every morning the boulevard journals repeated the bulletin of the previous day, testifying to the presence of the "tout Paris," the "haute gomme," the "crème," the "gratin," "the top of the basket," the "élite des tendresses."

The funeral of Madame de Balzac last Wednesday was a melancholy sight. There were not more than fourteen people there, including the priests, and those who did follow the lady to her grave were, with one or two exceptions, Poles—a handful of those foreigners whom exile has early accustomed to press around a bier for fear their own may be deserted. Even the Société des Gens de Lettres had neglected to send a delegate, and of those soi-disant disciples of the master who noisily cite the name of Balzac to attract attention to their own paltry wares, not one sent a bouquet or a wreath of flowers to deck the funeral car of the widow of the author of the "Comédie Humaine."

The excellent écuyère, Mlle. Emilie Loisset, to whose début at the Cirque d'été the Parisians were looking forward with expectation, died yesterday from injuries sustained while training one of her horses on Saturday.

A new verse translation of "Othello," by M. Louis de Gramont, was brought out at the Odéon on Saturday. Othello is played by Taillade, and Desdemona by Mlle. Tessandier. The piece is admirably mounted, and the translation fairly good and very faithful; but it is to be feared that this attempt to acclimatise Shakespeare in Paris will not be any more successful than previous attempts by poets of greater talent than M. de Gramont.

A public meeting was held on Monday evening in connection with the opening of a new school which has lately been erected in Raymond-street, Battersea Park-road, by the London School Board. Mr. James Stiff, Chairman of the Works Committee, presided.

On Monday the customary Easter banquet given by the Lord Mayor took place at the Mansion House, the guests numbering about 300. The toast of the Foreign Ministers was responded to by the Envoy from Roumania and the Chinese, Chargé d'Affaires; that of the Houses of Parliament by Lord Thurlow and Mr. Marjoribanks, M.P.; and that of the Treasurers of the Royal Hospitals by Mr. Baggallay, who fills that office in the hospitals of Bridewell and Bethlem.

An act of great bravery occurred in connection with a fire at Stockport on Saturday night. Ann Loftus, aged sixteen years, escaped from the house in which the fire originated, but immediately afterwards discovered that her sister, aged seven, was still on the premises. Placing a shawl across her mouth, the girl rushed back into the house, ascended the stairs, which were then on fire, groped her way through the smoke, and, finding her sister, succeeded in rescuing her. The girl was burnt about the face, but otherwise escaped injury.

"PETS."

The manly gravity and natural dignity of this elderly sixteenth-century gentleman, who might be a comrade of Sir Walter Raleigh or Sir Francis Drake, none the worse for smoking his pipe and lounging at the house-door with his sweet little daughter, in the season of repose at home, command our interest in Mr. Garland's agreeable picture. As for the pretty child, whose artless amusement in feeding her feathered "Pets" has furnished a title for the pleasant scene of domestic life, her tenderness and playfulness may well afford to such a retired veteran, after long years of toil, of strife and peril, by land and sea, the most delightful solace that a fond father's heart can enjoy. The pigeons, too, are charming little creatures to watch in their brisk airy movements, descending from the wall, or rising again, hovering to and fro, circling around the hand that feeds them, striving to intercept one another, or standing below expectant of what she may chance to let drop. It is, altogether, quite a small idyll fraught with the most innocent sense of loving pleasure, and with a touch of sympathy between age and youth, between the care-worn sire and the fresh-hearted little maiden, not much beyond infancy, his dearest home companion, which every one is glad to see.

OUR SPECIAL ARTIST IN EGYPT.

A page of Engraving in this Number of our Journal consists of Sketches furnished by M. Montbard, our Special Artist, who has been employed in delineating the scenery and popular life of Egypt since the affairs of that country became a political topic of the day. He has sketched views of the Nile and its banks; at Boulak, a suburb and river-port of that city, where the Museum of Egyptian Antiquities is established; along the line of the railway, which runs parallel with the river, up its mighty course, towards Slout, the chief town of Upper Egypt; and near Ghizeh, a few miles above Cairo, with the first view of the amazing Pyramids. Those stupendous works of antiquity, from thirty to forty centuries old, stand upon a rocky platform, 150 ft. high, with the Libyan mountain range behind them. The ground upon which they are erected, as well as the desert plain beneath, is now covered with deep layers of sand, but was probably, in the age of the Pharaohs, a cultivated and inhabited tract of country, on the left or west bank of the Nile. The Pyramids are built of limestone blocks from the quarries at Masarah, on the eastern or Arabian side of the river, but were cased, at least one of them was, with finely cut triangular slabs of Syenite granite, which was highly polished; and the masonry throughout is so neat and exact, that the jointing is not easily seen. The largest Pyramid is about as high as St. Paul's Cathedral, and its base is about the size of Lincoln's Inn-fields. It is the northernmost Pyramid, often called the Pyramid of Cheops, which is usually ascended by tourists, as this has been stripped of the smooth stone casing, and the blocks, each about 4 ft. high, serve for steps to climb to the top. But it is rough and hard climbing, and the Arabs or Bedouins engaged as guides are wont to drag and push the struggling Englishman or Frenchman, pulling him up by the arms, lifting his feet and legs, and shoving his body unceremoniously forward in a manner that is not very pleasant. They will by no means let him try to get up alone, and their vociferation, when they have him in custody, is alarming to a timid or nervous stranger. Two or three of the Pyramids can be entered, by narrow, low-roofed passages, which turn steeply up and down, to explore the inner sepulchral chambers, in which was found more than one sarcophagus, with the mummies of ancient Kings, now in the British Museum or elsewhere. The so-called Pyramid of Mycerinus is but half the size of those above mentioned, and is rather believed to have been constructed, at a much later date, by Queen Nitocris, widow of Thothmes III., who reigned in the fifteenth century before Christ. Our Artist has sketched a party of visitors with torches clambering up the interior passages of this Pyramid. There are other groups of Pyramids in Middle and Lower Egypt, to the number of thirty-nine altogether, but all on the western side of the Nile, and near the margin of the desert, which has greatly encroached upon the inhabited territory of the ancient kingdom, by the continual advancing movement of the sands. The last of them, going up from Boulak to Minieh, is called "the False Pyramid," from a belief that its centre is not composed of artificial masonry, but is a portion of the solid rock; its base is 350 ft. square, and its shape differs much from that of the regular pyramidal structures. The human figures drawn by our artist are Bedouin guides, and sellers of relics of antiquity, with the head of a village Sheik and another leading man. He shows us, also, the interior of an Arab hut or cottage, where a European visitor sits conversing with the people.

The gardens which have taken the place of the old tombstones round the ancient Church of St. Margaret, Westminster, have been thrown open to the public.

The Temple Opera-House at Bolton, one of the largest theatres in the provinces, was destroyed by fire after the audience had quitted it last Saturday night.

Opposition is being organised to the proposal to remove Smeaton's lighthouse from the Eddystone Rock and to re-erect it on Plymouth Hoe.

The spring general meeting of the National Rifle Association will be held at the Royal United Service Institution, Whitehall-yard, on Monday afternoon, May 22. The Duke of Cambridge, president of the association, will take the chair.

The trial of Maclean for shooting at her Majesty took place at the Reading Assize Court on Wednesday. The jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty" on the ground of insanity, and the prisoner was therefore ordered to be confined during her Majesty's pleasure.

Over thirty miners are believed to have lost their lives by an explosion in the Tudhoe Colliery, near Durham. One of the explorers who went to the rescue of the imprisoned men was suffocated.—Another colliery explosion, attended with loss of life, has occurred at West Stanley pit, Durham.

"General" Booth, writing to the Times, incidentally gives some striking evidence as to the growth of the Salvation Army. In three years and a half its corps have risen from 48 to 286; and the number of officers engaged in and wholly supported by the work from 100 to 623.

Mrs. Harris, of Wheeler-end, near Wycombe, celebrated her hundredth birthday last week, and in honour of the occasion was drawn in a carriage in triumphal procession through the village by more than 200 of her children and grandchildren. Of the former ten were present out of sixteen.

Sir William Harcourt has communicated with the Presidents of the Royal Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons, proposing that each should appoint a scientific analyst to investigate cases of criminal poisoning. The colleges have readily consented to do so.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty, while on her homeward journey from Mentone, was met at the Gare de Bercy by the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh and at the Nice railway station by the Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. Cherbourg was reached at half-past six p.m. on Thursday week, when the Queen and Princess Beatrice embarked on board the Victoria and Albert, where they passed the night. The next day being the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Princess's birthday, the band of the 25th Regiment of the French Army played a selection of music on board the Royal yacht in the morning, the Victoria and Albert steaming off at half-past ten for Portsmouth, conveyed by the Alberta, the Enchantress, and the Galatea. The Royal flotilla, after a somewhat heavy passage, reached Portsmouth at four o'clock. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar and the chief naval officials received her Majesty on landing, a guard of honour of the Royal Marines being in attendance. The Royal travellers continued their journey by special train, proceeding by the South-Western and Great Western Railways to Windsor, where the Mayor and Corporation received the Queen at the station. Most of the inhabitants of the borough turned out to greet her Majesty on her welcome return, and a detachment of the 2nd Scots Guards, opposite Henry VIII.'s Gateway, saluted as she passed to the castle. The Queen and the Princess are in excellent health.

Princess Christian dined with her Majesty on Saturday; and Prince Leopold arrived from Paris, his Royal Highness, although still slightly lame from his fall, being in good health. The Hon. Victor Spencer joined the Royal dinner circle.

The Queen and Princess Beatrice attended Divine service on Sunday in the private chapel of the castle, the Rev. Francis J. Holland, Minister of Quebec Chapel, officiating. Prince and Princess Christian and Duke Ernest Günther of Schleswig-Holstein dined with her Majesty; and Prince Alfred and the Princesses of Edinburgh, who were staying at Cumberland Lodge, visited the Queen. Her Majesty, with Princess Beatrice and Prince Leopold, drove out.

Princess Christian dined with the Queen on Monday; and the Royal family have taken their usual out-of-door exercise during the week.

The Duke of Albany's marriage takes place next Thursday. General Sir C. H. Ellice is appointed a K.G.C.B.; and Mr. F. S. Reilly, Q.C., in recognition of legal services rendered to the Foreign and Colonial Departments; and Mr. R. Hart, Inspector-General of Chinese Imperial Maritime Customs, are made Knights Commanders of St. Michael and St. George.

The dedication of Epping Forest to the "use of the people for ever" by her Majesty is fixed to take place on May 13. The Queen will travel from Windsor by the Great Western, Metropolitan, and Great Eastern Railways to Chingford, and drive through the forest to King's Oak, where an address will be presented; returning by another route.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, who had a family party staying at Sandringham, including Princess Louise of Lorne, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck, attended Divine service at St. Mary Magdalene's Church, in the park, on Sunday morning, with their daughters and their relations; the Rector officiating. The Royal party went to the afternoon service at West Newton church, the Rector being assisted by the Rev. J. F. Mitchell. Their Royal Highnesses' visitors left on Monday for their respective homes, and the Prince came to Marlborough House. The Princess and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud left Sandringham on Wednesday for town.

The Prince and Princess have consented to visit Leicester on Whit Monday, in order to open the new Abbey Park, which is now being completed at a cost of over £40,000.

The Prince and Princess intend visiting Bradford for the purpose of opening the new Technical School, the date fixed being June 23. The Royal visitors will arrive at Milner Field, the residence of Mr. Titus Salt, on the previous evening, and on the day following the inaugural ceremony the Prince and Princess will attend a bazaar in aid of the Church Institute. His Royal Highness will also be present at a gathering of the Freemasons of West Yorkshire during his visit.

His Royal Highness has given his patronage and approval to the Museum and Art Gallery Extension Scheme of the Plymouth Institution, and has directed a grant of £50 to be made to the fund from the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall. He has also contributed £10 10s. towards the funds of the Royal Army Coffee Taverns' Association.

Princess Christian was present last Saturday at the opening of some new parochial schools at Sunninghill, near Ascot.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, who came from Paris, landed at Folkestone on Tuesday for the purpose of laying the foundation-stone of the New Convalescent Home to be erected on the East Cliff. They were received by Sir Edward Watkin and other gentlemen at the pier, whence they drove in the carriage of Mrs. Dawkins, the foundress of the home, to the Pavilion Hotel, where they lunched, after which their Royal Highnesses proceeded to the site, where a large concourse of people, with numerous clergy, had assembled. After a short service the Duchess, with a silver trowel, "truly laid" the first stone. Her Royal Highness next visited the old convalescent home at Shelloes-street, the Duke going with Sir Edward Watkin to inspect the Channel Tunnel. After leaving the home the Duchess went to the vicarage and to the old parish church, accompanied by the Vicar. Their Royal Highnesses left at a quarter to five for Clarence House.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught left Biarritz for Paris yesterday week. The health of the Duchess has greatly improved. The last week of their stay was a busy one. They went to see the processions at Feuentarabia and San Sebastian; the Duke laid the first stone of a new English club at Biarritz, and took part in several lawn-tennis matches between the players of Pau and Biarritz. Their Royal Highnesses passed a day at Pau, and were entertained by Lady Strathmore at luncheon.

Last Saturday the extraordinary session of the Austrian Delegation was opened by the President, Herr von Schmerling, who expressed the hope that order would ere long be established in Bosnia and Herzegovina, in preparation for the time when they might be incorporated with the Empire. The extraordinary credit demanded, amounting to 23,733,000 fl., was referred to the Budget Committee.

RUSSIA.

It is announced that the coronation of the Czar is to take place at Moscow in August next, the festivities to continue for a fortnight, and to cost about a million and a half sterling.

Still another Nihilist plot is reported to have been discovered in Moscow. The story is to the effect that a mine has been found under the church in which the Czar's coronation was to have taken place. Eighty workmen, it is said, have been arrested, and search is being made for a second mine. The Berlin correspondent of the Daily News learns, in connection with late arrests at Moscow, that, in addition to the eighty workmen engaged at the cathedral where the coronation ceremonies were to be held, an official occupying an important position at the exhibition buildings was also arrested. The Czar has accepted the offer of the St. Petersburg and Moscow noblemen to protect the Imperial family and maintain public order.

An Imperial ukase appoints Baron Jomini Secretary of State.

AMERICA.

The Senate on the 12th inst. confirmed the appointments of Mr. Chandler as Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Hunt as United States Minister to Russia, and Mr. Partridge as Minister to Peru. On the 13th the Senate passed the bill of the House of Representatives for removing the discriminating duty of 10 per cent upon products from countries east of the Cape of Good Hope imported from countries lying west of the Cape. A bill has been submitted proposing to repay to Great Britain the undistributed balance of the Geneva award.

The House of Representatives on Monday passed, by 201 votes against 37, the new Chinese Exclusion Bill, suspending immigrating into the United States for a period of ten years.

An aurora of remarkable extent, brilliancy, and grandeur was witnessed on Sunday night. It was observed over an immense territory.

The annual meeting of the subscribers to the Central London Throat and Ear Hospital, Gray's-inn-road, was held at the hospital on April 13, Mr. B. H. Van Tromp, vice-chairman of the committee, presiding. The secretary (Mr. R. Kershaw) read the annual medical statement, which showed that during the past twelve months 4869 out-patients had been treated, with 19,277 attendances. In the same period 209 patients had been admitted into the wards. This number of patients had been treated at a cost of £1643, of which the maintenance, medicines, and instruments amounted to £1192, and the management to £210. The income had exceeded the regular expenditure by £390.

Mr. John Shrimpton, of 38, Lincoln's-inn-fields, hon. secretary of the Society for Obtaining Homes for Working Girls in London, states:—"The society will open next month a large home, situate at 361, Brixton-road, S.W. It is to be known as Garfield House, in memory of the late President of the United States. Early in June another home will be opened—namely, Norfolk House, 50, Well-street, Hackney, E. These two homes will accommodate seventy-five. I am glad to be able to state that our homes are appreciated by the class we seek to benefit, and the rules for the occupants accord to them a healthful spirit of independence and self-reliance so necessary for their success in daily life. In our seven homes we provide accommodation for 250 young people, but a sum of £1000 is required to open our new homes free of debt."

A free library was on Tuesday handed over to the town of Wycombe. The institution, which comprises a large reading-room and a reference library of equal size, together with librarian's residence, committee-rooms, &c., situated in the centre of the town, was founded by Mr. J. O. Griffiths, Q.C., Recorder of Reading, and a native of Wycombe, in 1876. Since that year Mr. Griffiths has borne the entire cost of its support, the money raised by the public having been devoted to the formation of an endowment fund. This already amounts to more than £1200, and it is hoped will be largely augmented by the proceeds of a fancy fair to be held in July. Mr. Griffiths has presented the freehold buildings to the town, on condition that the fund be increased within the next seven years to £3000, and the formal transfer of the deeds took place on Tuesday evening, Lord Carrington and the Mayor of Wycombe accepting them on behalf of the town.

The Duke of Teck opens the Richmond Public Baths to-day. CHRISTCHURCH CATHEDRAL, CANTERBURY, NEW ZEALAND.

NEW ENGLISH CHURCH, ROME.

THE NEW ENGLISH CHURCH AT ROME.

The corner-stone of the new English church in the Via Babuino, dedicated to All Saints, to be used instead of that outside the Porta del Popolo, in which the English congregation has met since 1818, was laid two or three weeks ago by the British Ambassador to Italy, Sir Augustus Paget. The Archdeacon of Northumberland, Canons Lonsdale and Wickenden, the Revs. H. W. Wasse and W. Pickance, British chaplain and assistant-chaplain, with other clergymen of the Church of England, and the Rev. Dr. Nevin, American chaplain of St. Paul's in the Via Nazionale, assisted in the ceremony. Her Majesty's Ambassador, with his Secretaries of Embassy and Attachés, Mr. Wurts, Secretary of Legation, representing the Hon. George Marsh, United States Minister, and the members of the church committee, passed processionally along the line of the intended nave, which was strewn with box-leaves. The stone was lowered, and the Ambassador, striking it three times, said, "Thus, thus, and thus I lay the foundation-stone of this Church of All Saints, in the Name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; and may God prosper the undertaking." The church was designed by the late Mr. Street. Upon the foundations, always most costly in Rome, £60,000 have been spent; the site cost about £6000, and the committee have £5000 in hand. About £70,000 more is wanted to complete the building.

THE CATHEDRAL OF CHRISTCHURCH, NEW ZEALAND.

The finished portion of this Cathedral was consecrated on All-Saints' Day, 1881. The first settlers in Canterbury had from the beginning determined to make the Cathedral the central feature of what they hoped would be at some future date the rich and prosperous city of Christchurch; and on Dec. 16, 1864, the fourteenth anniversary of the settlement, the foundation-stone was laid, the designs for the Cathedral having been prepared by Sir Gilbert Scott. The foundations, the cost of which was very heavy, were completed in the following year, and then a great monetary depression fell upon the colony, and for some years the work was completely at a standstill; so much so that Mr. Anthony Trollope, having visited Christchurch in 1872, writes in his "Australia and New Zealand" that the idea of building the Cathedral had been abandoned. Happily, however, Mr. Trollope's prediction has not been realised. The nave is now completed; the tower and spire, reaching a height of 210 feet, have been built, and a peal of ten bells given by one of the oldest settlers, Mr. R. H. Rhodes, and the family of his brother, the late Mr. G. Rhodes; and a temporary wooden apse has been added. The furniture of the chancel is very perfect, all being individual gifts by various persons. The organ, by Messrs. Hill and Sons, London, has been sent from England.

BRETHREN OF THE FIRST FREEMASONS' LODGE IN MOROCCO, AL MOGHREB AL AKSA, AT TANGIERS.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

NATIVES OF SIBERIA.

In connection with the journey of our Special Artist and the New York Herald Commissioner across Siberia, to convey relief to the shipwrecked crew of the Jeannette, Arctic exploring steam-yacht, sent by Mr. James Gordon Bennett to that remote northern coast, some illustrations of the uncivilised Asiatic populations of the Steppe and of Western Siberia may be interesting to the reader. Our Artist has already furnished several sketches of the Kirghis Tartars, who may soon be met with after crossing the Ural mountains from Orenburg, or from Perm, and entering upon the great plains of Central and Northern Asia.

The Ostiaks, who have some claim to be considered as the aboriginal inhabitants of Siberia, occupy the north-western region. They are principally found in rude settlements scattered along the banks of the Ob or Obi, as far north as Obdorsk, and as far south as Tobolsk. Their chief occupation is fishing and hunting. The former yields them abundant means of subsistence, as the rivers teem with fish; and hunting supplies them with valuable furs for barter. Some of the Ostiaks lead a kind of pastoral life, and keep large herds of reindeer, which furnish them both with food and clothing. In summer, they live in wretched temporary huts, framed of boughs and covered with birch bark. Their filthy bodies are but scantily clad. Small in stature, lean and lank, with a scared hangdog look, and a stupid expression on their broad ugly faces, they seem a degraded race. It is true that on the water they show to better advantage in their light skiffs or canoes, which they manage with wonderful dexterity. But the Ostiak is only seen at his best in winter, and in that far north which is his home. There he leads the primitive life for which he is best suited; and there, warmly clad in the skin of the reindeer, while swiftly gliding on his snow-shoes in pursuit of game, or bounding along in the "narta," the sledge drawn by dogs or deer, he may feel himself the true lord of the snowy wilderness that stretches to the Arctic Ocean. The winter habitations of the Ostiaks are rude dwellings, built of logs, with an opening at the top for the smoke. The light is admitted by means of a rough but ingenious contrivance. An aperture made in the hut is fitted with a large block of ice, which serves as a window, and is renewed at will, when it has become thawed. The dress worn by the Ostiaks is of reindeer skins. It consists of, first, a fur coat, which is seamless, and is slipped on over the head, and reaching to the knee; next, drawers of the same material, fastening round the body; lastly, fur boots, with the hair turned inside. Over this dress is worn another, of which the various parts are the same, only that the skins are those of the old reindeer, the hair of which is thicker and longer.

Beyond the Arctic Circle, near the Kara Sea, and along the estuaries of the Ob and the Yenisei, dwell the Samoyeds, who in many points resemble the Ostiaks. They, too, lead a kind of nomadic life, roaming about in quest of pastures for their reindeer, of which they possess large herds. They are more inclined to the chase than to fishing. Keen and bold hunters, they do not even shrink from encountering, single-handed, the huge polar bear, with no other weapon than the bow, or a knife fastened to a pole. They bring to market, at Obdorsk, on the Ob, the choicest furs; among the rest, a peculiar variety of wolfskin, much prized by the natives. The Samoyeds are tall and slender, but the women small. The dress of the latter is far more elegant than that of their Ostiak neighbours. It is not made of deerskins, but of different furs, carefully selected with a view to effect. The Russian capital is visited every winter by a few Samoyeds from the government of Archangel.

The sale by auction of the second part of the celebrated Sunderland library began on Monday, when several rare and interesting works, including early editions of Cicero and some ancient chronicles, were sold at fair prices. The sale continues through the week.

A number of people have narrowly escaped death by poison at Retly, near Wellington, in the county of Salop. A woman and her four children, who had eaten some "jam" purchased at a shop in the district, were suddenly taken ill, and narrowly escaped death. The "jam" was sent to the county analyst, who, upon investigation, found it was composed of "gooseberry tops," apples, rhubarb, and other things, the mixture of which had produced fermentation.

RIPON CATHEDRAL.

The quiet little country town of Ripon, in the north-west part of Yorkshire, was made the See of a Bishop in the seventh century, under the Saxon kingdom of Northumbria; but this Bishopric remained in abeyance more than a thousand years. It was revived in 1836, the Diocese including the Deanery of Craven, part of the Deaneries of Ainsty and Pontefract, and those populous manufacturing districts of the West Riding which contain the towns of Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, and Wakefield.

The Cathedral at Ripon has arisen from a Benedictine Monastery founded by the Monks of Melrose, but which gave place, under the Normans, to a Convent of Augustinian Canons, and this was converted, after the Reformation, into a Collegiate Church. The Archbishops of York held the manor of Ripon, and often resided there, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, when they built the older parts of the existing cathedral, in the Transition and Early English Gothic styles; but parts of the choir, and the nave, are Perpendicular architecture, of the fifteenth century. The chapter-house is a Norman building. The west front, not shown in Mr. Read's drawing, is a singularly pure example of Early English; it presents a central gable, 103 ft. high, between flanking towers somewhat higher, divided by flat buttresses from the central compartment. The grace and harmony of the whole design, though its component parts are simple, will be appreciated by a correct taste; but this front is too narrow for an effective view; and the Artist has preferred a view from the south-east, showing the choir and south transept, with the low central tower.

FREEMASONRY IN MOROCCO.

The Al Moghreb al Aksa Lodge of Freemasons, a group of whose Brethren we give amongst our Illustrations, was opened on the 23rd ult. in the city of Tangiers, Morocco, and is the first established in that Moslem Empire. We understand that new lodges will shortly be in operation in other cities and seaports; and it is anticipated that the craft will flourish apace now that a commencement has been made. This lodge derives its charter from the Grand Lodge of Manitoba; and its name, which is the old Saracen or Arabic appellation for Morocco, means the "Far West," as the Arabian conquerors of Mauritania considered that country the farthest western limit of the world. The principal leaders in the Moorish Masonic movement are brethren connected with Canada. The Rev. R. Stewart Patterson, Past Grand Master of Manitoba, is Deputy-Grand Master for Morocco, and was long resident in Ontario. The Worshipful Master of the "Al Moghreb al Aksa" Lodge, Captain Ballard, hails from Montreal; and his Senior Warden, the Rev. W. H. Bullock, Chaplain to her Majesty's Forces, is a native of Halifax, Nova Scotia. These gentlemen are sojourners at Gibraltar, nearly opposite Morocco. The names of the officers and members represented in the group are as follows, commencing with the brother standing to the right:—1. Brother Damian Dobvanich, organist. 2. Brother Enrique, a Jewish gentleman of Tangiers. 3. Brother Lyons, Director of Ceremonies. 4. Brother Worth, Treasurer. 5. Brother Bell, Past Master, Calpe Lodge, Gibraltar. 6. Brother Silva, Superintendent of Works and Kaid of Moorish Engineers. 7. Brother Sidi Abdullah Benarais, Junior Warden. 8. Brother J. R. Ballard, Captain A.P.D., Worshipful Master. 9. Brother R. Stewart Patterson, Special Grand Master, Morocco. 10. Brother Ross, Deputy Master. 11. Brother Hadj Ali Butalib, a nephew of the Amir Abdul-Kadir of Algiers, and a Knight of the Red Eagle. 12. Brother Levi A. Cohen, Acting Senior Warden. 13. Brother Charles Johnston, P. Senior Grand Warden, Gibraltar. 14. Brother Manuel Novello, British Embassy, Tangiers, Junior Deacon. 15. Brother Enrico Lugaro, Senior Deacon. 16. Brother Antonio Gutierrez, Inside Guard. 17. Brother M. Adato, Italian Embassy, Tyler. The Shereef Hadj Ali Butalib a few months ago returned from a visit to Timbuctoo, to which place he had gone with the Austrian traveller, Dr. Linz. Having been instrumental in saving the life of his companion from the wild desert tribes, he was decorated by the Emperor of Germany with the order of the Red Eagle.

The Modern Review contains several thoughtful and valuable articles. The most important are in general of a theological or philosophical cast, including one on the date and tendency of the book of Ecclesiastes, by Mr. T. Tyler, who considers that it was probably composed about 200 B.C.; and a review of Mr. Rhys Davids's Hibbert Lectures on Buddhism, by Professor Kern.

The most acceptable among the contributions to the Melbourne Review are those of local interest, embodying information not otherwise accessible in this country. Foremost among these are biographical notices of two remarkable Australians recently deceased—Marcus Clarke, the first Australian writer whose productions afford promise of a national literature; and Moses Wilson Gray, a politician of mark, and afterwards a Judge in New Zealand.

The secretary of the London Chamber of Commerce on Monday received notice of a resolution unanimously adopted by the Union Nationale of Paris, which represents ninety-six chambers of commerce, regretting the rupture of the negotiations for the Anglo-French Treaty of Commerce, and expressing the desire that the negotiations should be resumed as early as possible, even though some concessions should have to be made with regard to specific duties, especially those on woollen and cotton fabrics.

A COLONIAL EXHIBITION.

The Dutch people have resolved upon an enterprise which ought to secure the sympathy and co-operation of Great Britain and other countries with colonial possessions. The British exports to Holland and its dependencies in 1880 amounted in value to considerably over forty-six millions sterling, while the imports from those places were valued at more than twenty-eight and a half millions. These facts afford some idea of the extent of Great Britain's intercourse with the Netherlands, and suggest a community of interest which must prevent this country from feeling indifferent to the tendencies of Dutch enterprise. The undertaking in which Holland is now engaged is the promotion of an "International Exhibition of Colonial Objects and of General Exportation," which is to be held in Amsterdam, the commercial capital of the Netherlands, in the months from May to October next year. The Dutch are proud of Amsterdam, especially since its brilliant success in making for itself direct communication with the sea; and it is a committee of the most influential of Amsterdam's citizens who have been intrusted with the organisation of the projected Exhibition. As London, Paris, Vienna, Philadelphia, Melbourne, and other cities which have been the scenes of "world's shows," Holland claims the privilege and honour of taking the initiative in organising a concourse between the various colonising peoples such as has never yet taken place. And the committee are confident that this Exhibition will prove of immense interest, and throw a new light on colonies in general. No one can doubt that there is yet a good deal to learn about far-away countries and peoples, their powers, and their needs; and the Colonial Exhibition at Amsterdam may be expected to increase greatly the knowledge on these subjects, to the advancement of civilisation and the benefit of trade and commerce. It is in contemplation to divide the great show into five departments, devoted respectively to the exhibition of colonial products, the display of goods suitable for export to the colonies, a retrospective exhibition of fine and industrial arts from the earliest ages, special and partly temporary exhibitions, and national and scientific lectures and meetings. The second department will, of course, embrace in its scope all that belongs or relates to the general export trade, and here a vast space is to be set apart for industry as applied to the transformation of matter. We only give an outline of the Dutch project; but it will serve to show how comprehensive the Exhibition at Amsterdam is likely to be, and how full of interest it must be to Great Britain and her Colonies. To enable those who wish to exhibit, the Committee has sent to all the Consuls of the Kingdom of the Netherlands in Great Britain the necessary information—such as the general regulations, programmes, and demands for admission.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.
In Two Epochs. By BLANCHARD JERROLD. With numerous illustrations. 3 vols., crown 8vo, cloth extra, 24s.
"The personal anecdotes are plentiful and to the point, and the illustrations are numerous and good."—Mr. Jerrold asks us to accept his volumes as "memoires pour servir" as materials towards a just judgment of the artist and the man. This is too modest. They form an entertaining biography, not the less readable for not being strictly consecutive."—Standard.

JAMES PAYN'S NEW NOVEL.
FOR CASH ONLY: A Novel. By JAMES PAYN. 3 vols., crown 8vo. At every Library.
"Mr. Pyn is lively as ever in his latest story. There are sketches of character most cleverly contrasted, drawn from a wide acquaintance with the world; while the sparkling dialogue is gemmed with good things, with apposite anecdotes, and with happy illustrations."—Times.

OUIDA'S NEW NOVEL.
IN MAREMMA: A Novel. By OUIDA. 3 vols., crown 8vo. At every Library.
"The new story by Ouida is very striking; the writer's touch is as vigorous and powerful as ever."—There are strong and brilliant passages in this novel."—Academy.

FOR BREAKFAST.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operation of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.
Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets, labelled.
JAMES EPPS and CO., HOMOEOPATHIC CHEMISTS.

FOR AFTERNOON USE.
EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE.
If cocoa seeds as imported are roasted, then broken up into "nibs"—small pieces—and subjected to very high pressure in an hydraulic press, they give out a large percentage of their oil or butter, which is removed, and the remaining constituents of the nibs fall into a powder—Chocolate Essence. This absolute cocoa is left unwatered. It possesses an alkali enlivening principle or alkaloid to that contained in tea or coffee. Boiled for a few minutes, it affords a beverage of a coffee-like consistency, may be affected by climate. Each packet (6d. or 1s.) or tin (6d., 1s., 2s., 3s., 4s., or 7s. 6d.) is labelled "James Epps and Co., Homoeopathic Chemists, 54, Threadneedle-street; and 170, Piccadilly."

EPPS'S ESSENCE SKILLET.—A pot for boiling Epps's Chocolate Essence, and which needs no watching, its speciality being that the contained liquid cannot boil over. Half-Pint Size, 1s.; Pint, 1s. 3d.; Two Pints, 1s. 6d.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored
by this specific: after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Unequalled as a dressing: it causes scalp, arrests falling, and its use defies detection. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials free.—Agents, B. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

ROBARE'S AUREOLINE, or GOLDEN
HAIR WASH.—For producing the beautiful golden colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 6s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all principal Perfumers and Chemists throughout the world.—Agents, B. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

SULPHOLINE LOTION.—An external
Cure for Skin Diseases. There is scarcely any eruption but will yield to SULPHOLINE and fade away in a few days. Ordinary pimples, redness, blotches, scurf, roughness, vanish as if by magic: while old skin disorders, that have plagued sufferers for years, however deeply rooted, Sulpholine will successfully attack them. It destroys the animalcules which cause these unsightly, irritable affections, and always produces a clear skin. Sulpholine Lotion is sold by Chemists. Bottles, 2s. 6d.

"I can highly recommend Dr. LOCOCK'S PULMONIC WAFERS for all Throat Irritation and Chest Diseases."—J. Swain, M.P.S., 225, Mill-street, Liverpool. They taste pleasantly.

THROW PHYSIC TO THE DOGS.
A correspondent writes to ask me which I consider the best medicine for a "confirmed dyspeptic subject" to induce in "My dear Sir, or Madam (I don't know which it is, for only initials have been used as a signature), I am not a doctor, neither do I profess to know anything at all about the British Pharmacopoeia. When advised to take this or that nostrum for any little ailment, I always quote Shakespeare, "Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it." And I would say the same to my present interlocutor. ENO'S FRUIT SALT is the only thing in the way of medicine I indulge in; and though it may sound something like a puff, yet I find that it is all I require to keep me in health, provided I also remember St. Paul's advice to be temperate in all things.—Pictorial World, Feb. 25, 1882. "Notes on Men and Things."

CAUTION.—Legal rights are protected in every civilized country. Examine each bottle, and see the capsule is marked "Eno's Fruit Salt." Without it, you have been imposed on by worthless imitations. Sold by all Chemists, Price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. Directions in sixteen languages how to prevent disease. Protection in every country. Prepared only at Eno's Fruit Salt Works, Hitcham, London, S.E., by J. C. Eno's Patent.

SPECTACLES VERSUS BLINDNESS.

One-fourth of those suffering from blindness can trace their calamity to the use of common spectacles or lenses imperfectly adapted to the sight. Mr. HENRY LAURANCE, F.R.S., Oculist Optician, PERSONALLY adapts his Improved Spectacles at his residence, 3, Endelburgh-gardens, Euston-square, daily (Saturdays excepted) ten to four. Sir Julius Benedict writes:—"I have tried the principle of opticians in London with success, but your Spectacles are time admirably. The clearness of your glasses, as compared with others, is really surprising." Dr. Bird, Chelmsford, late Surgeon-Major, W.E.M., writes:—"I could not have believed it possible that my sight could have been so much improved and relieved at my age—eighty-two. I can now read the smallest print, although suffering from cataract on the right eye." Similar testimonials from John Lowe, Esq., M.D., J.P., Lynn, Physician to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales; Ven. Archdeacon Palmer, Clifton; Lieut.-Gen. Macmillan, Brentwood; Rev. Mother Abbess St. Mary's Abbey, Hendon; Rev. J. Hargreaves, Uxbridge; and hundreds of others. PEOPLE I HAVE MET.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THAT ARTFUL VICAR."

THE DOWAGER.

I remember that the noble family of SydeWynde were all much impressed by Anne, Marchioness of Boltington. Any reference to that gorgeous lady was sufficient to command their attention even in times of toothache or five minutes before a hunt breakfast in the country. The present Marquis was but a very small party compared with his overwhelming relative by marriage, and, except that he had occasion now and then to bless himself because his father had made so judicious a choice on his second nuptials, his hereditary estate of nineteen acres had nothing in common with the grandeur of "Beechwood," which ill-informed people sometimes called Lady Boltington's (Anne) dower house. After mentioning the tokens of respect paid to her by a peer of his exalted rank and his belongings, it is needless to add that the Marchioness Anne possessed a large fortune, entirely under her own control. Her Ladyship's father (Tom Bilkins, of Manchester, who did so sharp a business with Japan when it was first opened to British enterprise) rather encouraged her idea of enlisting in the ranks of the aristocracy when she first made this bold idea known to him; but he took care that she should do so under easy conditions. He, therefore, looked for the right sort of coronets, and as there was only one fat middle-aged Duke in the market, rather out of fashion too, he bid for the best Marquis in the stock just then. He did not grudge what he paid for the nobleman, though it was, as he often observed in after days, "rather beyond the price current," but he insisted that, the cash once handed over to his Lordship, there all financial transactions between them should end. Grip, Holdfast, Clench, Binder, and Grip, the eminent conveyancers, drew the settlements, which were unusually stringent in their provisions; and when the most honorable Altamont-Savory-Keane-SydeWynde, third Marquis of Boltington, had spent his own purchase money he departed upon foreign travel, as had been the custom of his predecessors since the first Marquis had paid the debts of the Prince Regent and ruined himself.

Fortunately, the Lord who had given a title to the pretty Manchester girl died within a reasonable time. She had behaved very kindly to him, paying his tailors' bills now and then, and allowing him quite enough for pocket-money; but he was an incurable gambler, and when he departed this life, after a run of ill-luck at hazard, it was certainly a relief. The new Marquis was a much more reasonable person. He had, luckily for himself, not been an eldest son, and only dropped into the succession by accident, as collateral heir. He was then a decent sort of fellow, who had a small appointment in the Customs or the Excise, and kept fowls in a back garden at Kentish Town. Of course, when he came into the family honours, his pursuits were modified. The Dowager knew far too well what was due to herself not to be good to him. She sent for him, indeed, to call upon her the day after he had taken his seat in the Legislature, and promised to continue the weekly pay which she had allowed to his deceased kinsman, till she could do something still better for him. Shortly afterwards, too, on the eve of a borough election, where the votes of her tenantry were much wanted, she got him made commissioner of something, which was in reality a snug sinecure worth fifteen hundred a year. She always felt generously towards the man who bore her name, helped him to rear his numerous offspring; and even after he was provided for she continued his allowance to his eldest son, and promised it should go with the title if he behaved himself. All she exacted was obedience, and she got it to her heart's content.

She never cared to marry again, or, with her property, she would not have wanted for offers among the upper classes. She wisely chose, however, to remain free, and went a great deal into society. No party recorded in the Morning Post was ever considered complete without her; and her stately carriage, with three footmen in bag-wigs hanging on behind, made an imposing figure on drawingroom days at Court. People in high places were fond of her, because she wanted nothing, and had a great deal to give away. Besides, she was not young enough to be a flirt, and not old enough to be a bore. Her dinners were admirable, and she gave a great many of them. Her country house at Beechlands, which Tom Bilkins had bought after glorious news from the China seas, was one of the finest show-places in England, and the Dowager had made it thoroughly comfortable. General SydeWynde, an elderly military officer who was a competent judge of wine, managed her cellar, and performed the delicate duties of her chief butler; his brother, a Yorkshire squire, replenished her stables; and Lady Selina SydeWynde, daughter of the second Marquis, and still unmarried at fifty-five, was lieutenant over her household, she only acting on judiciously-selected occasions as commander-in-chief. So the world had nothing to say against her. She surrounded herself with SydeWyns, and dealing so impartially with them that no one of them could pretend to be greater than his fellows, or to hold an undue share of her favours. She gave ecclesiastical benefices in her patronage to three of them; she put one in the army, two in the navy, as the more patriotic service, and there was a whole company of little SydeWyns scattered about on the foundations of public schools through her influence with trustees and head masters.

Thus, gradually, she came to wield a real and permanent authority over the great world of London. Both Court and Ministries found her useful, for she learned how to bring together people who wanted to see each other, and was a charming hostess. An invitation to her house was everywhere recognised as a brevet of social rank, and her introduction could open many of the best drawing-rooms in Europe. Cabinets were formed in her boudoir over the caravan tea, which was served in Sévres cups of an afternoon; and matches by the dozen were made in her conservatory. Her town house was one of the best in Carlton-gardens, and lay right in the midst of the world of fashion and politics. Every politician also knew that it was quite safe to visit her, and that Boltington House was neutral ground. They could go there without being pestered to do anything unreasonable, and if a negotiation had to be gingerly managed between rival Premiers or Secretaries of State they could talk over the hotter questions without compromising themselves; and an intelligent good-natured woman, who is always rich, free, and at home when wanted, can do wonders in such cases.

The Marchioness (Anne) was truly grand as a pacificator. She could use just the arguments wanted for reconciling people who are offended with each other. She could make point-blank appeals to the interest of one person and to the feelings of another. It was known that her influence was powerful enough to do anything in reason, and that which could not be done through her could hardly be done at all. She was perfectly well aware of the tone and temper of society concerning all social disputes, and had heard the opinions of the highest personages in the realm about them. Her advice, therefore, was worth having when she could be persuaded to give it; and it sometimes astonished her to see how many illustrious people were glad to know what she thought of their affairs. Prelate and Judge, captains of great renown, place-hunters who would not have spoken of their hopes to their own brothers or sons talked over them with her, for one of the secrets of her power was that she was always loyal to the trust reposed in her. Once, and it was said to be the rarest thing that ever happens in this country, there was a murmur of enthusiasm when she appeared at a Royal garden-party, for as she entered, a very model of gracious dignity, the first lady in the land advanced some steps, then took her by both hands and kissed her. It was whispered that something had happened in connection with one of the Princes; but this was mere surmise, and nothing ever transpired to confirm the rumour. All the world saw or heard was that Royalty was pleased, and that whatever the Marchioness (Anne) had done had been well done.

So two generations of her friends and admirers passed by, and she who had been always wise and gentle became venerable also. As extreme old age came upon her she went out less, but her reception days were thronged by all that was beautiful and renowned in England. She began to give away several of the most splendid of her jewels and personal ornaments. Her famous pearls from the Potemkin collection went to Mable SydeWynde on her wedding with Lord Gale. A great Brazilian diamond, which had belonged to the Princely Chandos, was a bridal gift to her sister, who married Mr. Tempest, the rich Australian. Some of the finest of her Indian shawls went to others of the race whose title she bore. But it came at last to be noticed that a little girl with wondering blue eyes and golden hair was always with her. She was known as plain Miss Alice Smith, a distant relative of My Lady's father, till people came to speak of her as the great heiress. When the present Lord Boltington's eldest son won the Victoria Cross in Zululand, the Marchioness (Anne) made a match between them.

Professor Humphry, M.D., F.R.S., senior surgeon to Addenbrooke's Hospital, Cambridge, has been re-elected a member of the Court of Examiners of the Royal College of Surgeons of England for a period of five years.—At a meeting of the council on the 13th inst. the Jacksonian Prize was awarded to Dr. William Alexander, of Bedford-street, Liverpool, for his essay on the pathology and surgical treatment of diseases of the hip-joint. Mr. Alexander, who pursued his studies at the Queen's University, Ireland, whence he graduated M.D., with gold medal and exhibition, 1870, was admitted a Fellow of the College of Surgeons by examination, June 14, 1877, is the author of valuable contributions to surgical science.

Yesterday week the Devonshire Chamber of Agriculture passed a resolution in favour of the speedy creation of representative county boards.—At a meeting of the Chester Chamber of Agriculture last Saturday the Duke of Westminster remarked on the unsatisfactory state of the land laws, but feared Government would be unable to deal with them this Session. He declared himself favourable to legislation giving compensation for unexhausted improvements.—The Bath and West of England Agricultural Society will hold its annual exhibition this year for the second time at Cardiff, and it has been arranged that the meeting shall be opened on Whit Monday, and be kept open for the remainder of the Whitsun week. The local committee have added a liberal amount to the prize-list for special local premiums.

FINE ARTS.

INSTITUTE OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

Notwithstanding the recent addition of some half-dozen new members, we hardly remember an exhibition of this society so poor as a whole as that which opened on Monday last. One may pace two thirds of the gallery and have the attention scarcely arrested forcibly by any work at once fine and important. Several causes have combined to this result. The Institute could probably display quite as much ability as the parent society, but much of this remains latent for the reasons that so many of its members (besides those on the honorary list) are oil-painters, who are yearly drawn more away from water-colours by their successes in the stronger medium; while many others expend most of their energies in designing for the wood engravers. On this occasion, among the usual contributors who are absent altogether are Messrs. Herkomer, E. J. Gregory, Seymour Lucas, Boughton, A. C. Gow, and Wolf. Then several other leading members are very sparingly represented. Mr. J. D. Linton, for instance, has but one single-figure costume study (58) of a lady in a greenish yellow satin robe with a lute;—the face and hand beautifully modelled, the colouring artistically qualified with tone, but comparatively uninteresting. Mr. Small sends a version of an oil-picture already exhibited representing men from a life-boat rescuing "Survivors" (150) of a wreck from the rigging of the sunken ship. It is a sensational subject very effectively treated, but the interest is not novel for the reason indicated. G. Clausen has but one small drawing (138) of a man and boy carrying faggots of wood in the twilight; it is, however, remarkable for its sentiment and grave tone; it might be by a French painter of similar subjects. F. W. W. Topham, also, is represented by one drawing only, No. 47, a scene beneath the porch of an Italian Gothic church, with a lady passing a poor woman seated with her babe at her breast on the steps, with the exclamation "Poveretta" (as intimated by the title), but with no apparent intention of offering more active sympathy. The expression of the lady's face is, however, enigmatical. Charles Green has two drawings—one (65) of a clown putting his performing dogs through their tricks before the audience of a provincial circus; the other, and to us far preferable, of a draper showing his "Summer Goods" (22) to a fair customer in a huge poke bonnet and a high-waisted dress of sixty years ago. The brilliant daylight that floods the shop is very skillfully managed.

All these artists are oil-painters, and their absence, or the paucity of their contributions, may possibly be accounted for in part by a relative decline in the demand for water-colour drawings generally, concurrently with the decline of the inflated prices that obtained for drawings by David Cox, Müller, and other masters a few years back. Other painters, however, who are known exclusively, or almost exclusively, as water-colourists, are also not now in force. Mr. T. Collier, for instance, sends but one drawing, though it is of goodly dimensions—No. 157, called "Under the Crag"—a rather uninteresting study of débris of grey rocks, with an outlook over a wild heath under a sky of silvery cumuli, very mouvementé, but unusually limited in range of colour; the dashing handling, moreover, is carried almost to excess. Mr. T. Walter Wilson has one large and striking drawing, "Good Bye" (34)—a man and woman standing high on the lofty deck of an emigrant-ship as she wears away from the suppositious quay. But it is difficult to realize the spectator's imaginary point of station in order that the bulwarks should appear so high, and the water so far below.

As already intimated, the new members do not largely aid the show. Even regarding Mr. MacWhirter's "Lake of Men-teith" as a sketch merely, we are bound to say that the mannered strokes in sky, water, and foliage are inadmissible, and quite unworthy of an Associate of the Academy. There is considerable merit, both as regards colour and draughtsmanship, in Percy Macquoid's single drawing, "Iconoclasts" (131)—a boy with pistol, his sister by his side, riddling the figures in a stained-glass window. The incident is, however, scarcely probable, and generally this promising young artist may be recommended not to waste good art on trivial subjects. George S. Elgood, a young Nottingham artist, we believe, is an acquisition to the society. His predilection appears to be (like that of Mr. Fulljove when he made his début) for Elizabethan and other old English houses and garden pleasures, of which No. 121 affords a charming example. He is careful, yet unlaboured, in execution, unvulgar in colour, and a nice keeping obtains in his works. Keeley Halswelle's "On the River Below Sonning" is taking, by virtue of its dextrous, decisive handling, but it is deficient precisely in the quality of keeping or harmonious unity, owing to the exaggerated metallic effect. Joseph Knight exhibits nothing of the importance of some drawings with which he has from time to time made a mark; and we only noted in the present examples a tendency to monotonous colouring and formal execution. Randolph Caldecott is very favourably known to the public as a designer for children's books and other publications; but, judged as a painter, distinct from a designer, he has evidently much to learn in technicalities. The excessive use of body colour is unpleasant, to say the least, in his "Scene at Florence" (39) with a procession of the ghastly black-robed brotherhood of the Misericordia bearing a patient to the hospital. In the graceful fancy and humorous characterisation of the "Fancy Ball at Florence" (186) the artist is far more at home; and, as there is no attempt to carry the work to completion as a picture, it is much more satisfactory.

It is our more agreeable duty to record the marked advance made by Messrs. Harry Hine, J. Orrock, and W. W. May. The several contributions of the first are full of unforced suggestions of harmonious colour. Mr. Orrock keeps to the old lines in subject and treatment, but gains in grasp of his materials in strength and decision—see Woodhouse, Leicester (69), and, better still, "In Charnwood Forest" (72). Mr. May, while enlarging the range of his subjects, develops new resources, which are, however, modestly and faithfully employed, according to his wont. Especially commendable are "The Port of Havre" (135) and the sunny scene, "In the Canal, Ostend" (142). J. Aumonier's works are always refined, but his "Old-fashioned Garden" (32) strikes us as just a little too positive in colour. We hardly know what to say of H. J. Stocks' drawings of a lover placing a rose wreath on a sleeping girl (151), and another of a man reclining in reverie during the playing of an organ by a girl, while above him rises a nude figure enveloped in flame and smoke, symbolical of "The Aspiration of a Soul while listening to Music" (184). As draughtsman and colourist Mr. Stocks ranks high here: his models and colouring are derived from elevated Italian sources, and we must sympathise with any aim at spiritual significance in the prosaic world of contemporary art. But the artist's imagination is scarcely inventive; it decidedly needs chastening; and he should beware of the narrow limits between the sublime and the ridiculous. Towneley Green's pleasant, carefully elaborated little figure-pieces with landscape backgrounds will be welcomed; as also will be W. Simpson's skilful records of travel; L. P. Smythe's dainty studies; the architectural pieces by L. Haghe, J. Fulljove, and W. Wyld—with which may be named Harry Johnson's view of Stonehenge by moonlight (44); the marine pieces of Edwin Hayes; and the still-life of J. Sherrin and Mrs. Duffield. The public will know, too, what to expect from E. M. Wimperis (one of the ablest followers of David Cox), from W. L. Leitch, E. Hargitt, Hugh Carter, and H. B. Roberts. Mr. Hine, senior, so long and deservedly a favourite at this gallery, is represented in his customary subjects; but we fear that the life of his drawings is being sacrificed more and more to excessive softness of gradations. E. H. Corbould, another member of long standing, but a very sparing exhibitor in recent years, sends a large drawing (on canvas, or paper prepared with a similar texture) of Mazepa surrounded with wild horses (102). The draughtsmanship shows a practised hand; and the spirit with which the horses are represented is incontestable. Yet, with all respect for an artist to whom the public owe many fanciful creations, the work seems to us theatrical in conception, and the labourous stippling mechanical, therefore lacking the precious quality of suggestiveness.

The private view of the Exhibition of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours takes place to-day (Saturday), and the exhibition will be open to the public on Monday next.

To-day also a private view takes place of Munkacsy's celebrated picture "Christ before Pilate," at the Conduit-street Gallery, and the gallery will be open to the public next Monday.

The private view of the Royal Academy Exhibition will be held on Friday next, and the Exhibition will be open to the public on the Monday following.

The private view of the Grosvenor Gallery Exhibition will take place next Saturday, and the exhibition will be open to the public on the following Monday.

The very important collection of foreign pictures formed by Mr. J. S. Forbes, which includes several of the finest works by Israels, will be sold at Messrs. Christie's to-day (Saturday) and Monday next.

The spring exhibition of modern water-colour drawings at the Royal Pavilion Gallery, Brighton, was opened on Thursday.

Her Majesty has given her patronage to the Academy of Arts which is being formed in North Wales, which will be known as "The Royal Cambrian Academy."

Sir S. Baker presided yesterday week at the distribution of prizes at the Newton Abbot Art Exhibition. The prizes were distributed by the Dowager Countess of Morley.

Between nine and ten thousand pictures, big and little, bad and good, have been submitted to the Council of the Royal Academy this year, being the largest number on record.

The exhibition of drawings organised at the Mansion House by the Coachmakers' Company and by St. Mark's School for Coachmakers closed yesterday week with the distribution of prizes by the Lord Mayor.

The Copyright Committee of the Law Amendment Society have not been inactive since the withdrawal at the close of the last Session of Parliament of their Bill dealing with copyright in works of literature, music, the drama, and the fine arts. The promoters consider that the best action for the present Session will be, in the first place, to proceed with a Bill confined to the requirements of the fine arts and photography only, leaving music and the drama to be dealt with by them hereafter. The committee have, therefore, introduced such a measure into Parliament. It has been drawn substantially on the lines of the Royal Academy's memorial to her Majesty's Government, which received the warm support of artists generally. When the Committee shall have succeeded in their efforts in this direction, they will again take up the other branches of copyright. The present Bill is "to amend and consolidate the law of copyright in works of fine art and in photographs, and for repressing the commission of fraud in the production and sale of such works." It is proposed that the duration of copyright should extend in the case of paintings and sculpture to thirty years after the death of the artist, and in the case of engravings to fifty years from the time of publication. In the case of photographs the term is also to be fifty years; but photographic portraits are not to be sold or exhibited in shop windows without consent of the person photographed.

The Duke of Westminster has made an offer to the Vestry of St. George's (Hanover-square), on behalf of himself, Mr. Cubitt, and Mr. Sloane Stanley, the owners of certain frontages in Grosvenor-road, to plant plane-trees along the Embankment between Claverton-street and the railway station near Chelsea-bridge-road.

The principal railway companies of the kingdom have completed a series of very important returns, extending over a fortnight, as to the number of parcels of seven, fourteen, twenty-eight, and fifty-six pounds carried during that time. The return also includes valuable information as to the conveyance of insured parcels in locked-up hampers from town to town, and the proportion of parcels for rural districts.

VOYAGES AND TRAVELS.

Our readers will recollect a series of illustrations of the "American Franklin Search Expedition," consisting of sketches taken by Mr. H. W. Klutschak, a Bohemian artist. He accompanied Lieutenant Schwatka's party from New York to find traces and relics of the unfortunate North-West Passage explorers, Sir John Franklin and the officers and crews of the Erebus and Terror, lost in the Arctic regions so long since as 1847. Another of the party, Mr. W. H. Gilder, the second in command, who was special correspondent of the New York Herald, has now completed and published his narrative. This makes an interesting volume, entitled Schwatka's Search (Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, and Rivington). The expedition, which went out in June, 1878, and returned in August, 1880, under the patronage of the New York Geographical Society, was composed of five persons—namely, Lieutenant Frederick Schwatka (of Polish lineage), a cavalry officer of the United States Army; Mr. W. H. Gilder, Mr. H. W. Klutschak, Frank Melms, an experienced whaler, and Joseph Eberbieng, an old comrade of Captain Hall and Dr. Hayes in their Arctic explorations some years ago. They were conveyed by a whaling-vessel to the north-west coast of Hudson's Bay, near Chesterfield Inlet, about 64 deg. N. latitude, and there landed. Towards the end of summer, they formed a camp on shore, named after Judge Daly, of New York, and abode there all through the winter of 1878. In February, they made an excursion southward to Marble Inlet, where they visited some American whaling-ships laid up for the winter. Information got from the Esquimaux, and from the sailors who had been in the northern archipelago, determined Lieutenant Schwatka to travel with sledges overland, in the summer of 1879, and to cross Simpson Strait from Adelaide Peninsula to King William Land. This overland journey of four hundred miles, in a northerly direction, by way of Wager river and Hayes river and Montreal Island, with the aid of friendly Esquimaux tribes and of their useful dogs, was prosperously performed. The expedition was further assisted by the Netchilliks and the Ootjooliks, tribes dwelling on the shores of Simpson Strait, which piece of water they crossed, and made a thorough examination of all the western and south-western shores of King William Land. It was here that the survivors of Sir John Franklin's party, in 1848, after the loss of their ships, finally endeavoured to make their way southward, to the American mainland, in the hope of ascending Back's River and so reaching Hudson's Bay. The result of Schwatka's discoveries is to leave no doubt that they perished in this attempt, dying probably of disease and hunger, on the coast of King William Land, probably near Washington Bay. There is no reason to doubt the story of Ahlangyah, the woman who says that she and her companions met some white men there, and that she afterwards saw the tent, with dead bodies, and with many articles belonging to them, at the head of Terror Bay. But we can attach little value to the wild notion of the Esquimaux or Inuits, that the white men had been eating each other's flesh, or to other fantastic ideas concerning them, such as that of one having a gold watch fastened by a chain "to his ears." The extreme simplicity and ignorance of those people would allow them to imagine such fabulous incidents, related after the lapse of thirty-two years, and the character of Ogzeuckjeuwock, as "medicine-man" of his tribe, would incline him to a fabulous exaggeration of this matter. The description of finding the grave of Lieutenant John Irving, third officer of the Terror, in Collinson Inlet, has a pathetic and romantic interest, which will have remained in the minds of those who read of it in our Journal a twelvemonth ago. They will remember that his bones were sent home to be interred, with Christian rites, by the care of his family at Edinburgh, as we noticed at the time. Lieutenant Schwatka's party, after devoting the summer of 1879 to King William Land, as far north as Cape Felix, in lat. 70 deg. N., returned to the south by way of Back's River, or the Great Fish River, travelling through the winter months, a feat which no Europeans had ever done before. They lived entirely upon the produce of the country, shooting reindeer and bears, seals and walrus, and catching fish; while they imitated some Esquimaux fashions of lodging and clothing. The cold in January was sometimes as great as 70 deg. below zero; and it is probable that no experience of overland travel in the Arctic Regions has been equally severe. Mr. Gilder's narrative is plainly and soberly written, and will doubtless command its proper share of attention.

We may also remind the readers of this Journal, with reference to the next book under notice, that our pages have been enriched with some of the sketches of Borneo, by Mr. Carl Bock, whose handsome volume is published by Sampson Low and Co. It bears the title, The Head-Hunters of Borneo, a Narrative of Travel up the Mahakkam and down the Barito, which are, of course, the names of two rivers. These are in the south-east region of that large island, quite remote from the country which has recently been placed by the native Sultans under the administration of a British trading Company. Mr. Bock is a scientific zoologist, who had gone out to the Dutch East Indies, in 1878, under the patronage of the late Marquis of Tweeddale. The Dutch Governor-General in Sumatra gave him a commission to explore the less known parts of Borneo, first the district of Koetei, on the east coast, with the Mahakkam river, then the interior country, and to descend another large river to a different coast of the island, at which he arrived in a southerly direction. The whole of this region, we understand, is claimed as under the Dutch sovereignty or protectorate; but some of its tribes are extremely wild, and the authority of the Malay Sultans is limited to those within actual reach. The first place visited by Mr. Bock was Tangaroeng, with its port, Samarinda, which is on the shore of the Strait of Macassar, opposite the island of Celebes. He was frankly welcomed by the Sultan, Mohammed Suliman, who appears to be a good-humoured fellow, though addicted to cock-fighting and other idleness. Mr. Bock went up the river Mahakkam, and northward to Long Wai, staying there seven weeks among the Dyaks, whose peculiar manners and customs he describes in six entertaining chapters. His graphic power with the pencil, as well as with the pen, is used to present that singular race of people in such vivid portraiture, that they seem almost living in this attractive book. The large coloured lithographs of their robust figures, often partly nude, and the delineations of their costumes, houses, furniture, and utensils, excel most of the illustrations of travellers' narratives that have lately appeared. There are thirty chromo-lithographs, with some engravings of portraits or animals, and a useful map. The author, having returned from his northward excursion, set forth again, to ascend the Mahakkam in a westerly direction, aided by the Sultan's steam-yacht, built at Glasgow, and accompanied by his Highness and suite most of the way. The Sultan's loitering habits made this honour rather a hindrance to the long and difficult journey that Mr. Bock had before him. At Moera Pahou, the farthest advanced inland settlement of the Malays in the Koetei province, he made his first acquaintance with the reputed cannibals of Borneo, the Tring Dyaks, some of whom happened to be visiting that place. The head-hunting exploits of this ferocious tribe, and their habitations of cruelty full of human skulls, are spoken of with terror by their peaceable Dyak neighbours, who refuse to associate with them; while the Malays, of course, as good Mohammedans, regard them much as we should do. The "natural man," if we come to know him, is not a very noble or amiable creature, but a rather nasty sort of cunning, savage beast. Sibau Mobang, the cannibal chief of the Trings, with whom this author had an interview while sketching his portrait, had just eaten "the hands and brains" of seventy slaughtered human victims, men, women, and children. He told Mr. Bock, indeed, that "his people did not eat this flesh every day," but that of various animals and birds, with rice and wild fruits. They have not the excuse of the Polynesian cannibals, who formerly could get little or no animal food, in their small islands, without devouring each other. It must not be supposed that all the Dyaks of Borneo, though barbarous and superstitious, are morally vile; on the contrary, says Mr. Bock, "robberies and theft are entirely unknown among them; they are also very truthful." They show great respect for their wives, and are very fond of their children; they marry early, but have only one wife. Their mental capacity is equal to that of the Malays, while the Dyaks are not so slovenly and lazy as these, and have more inclination to work. "Head-hunting," for the sake of possessing such hideous trophies of their warlike prowess, like scalp-hunting with the North American Indians, seems to be the universal Dyak custom. "You must not get heads," said Mr. Bock to Rajah Sinen and the fat chief of Long Wahou, speaking their native language; "but a doubtful smile," he tells us, "was all the reply to my proposition." The expedition inland, leaving the main river and the steam-boat, to pass up the lesser streams in five praus or native canoes, and subsequently marching through a forest across the border country, descended on Christmas Day, 1879, to the valley of the Barito in the territory of Doeseen, under the Dutch Government, at Fort Teweh or Lotoentoer. The author, perhaps for reasons of official reserve, has little to tell us about the Dutch administration of Southern Borneo. He briefly relates the fact of his going down, with the Sultan of Koetei, to the mouth of the Barito, the commercial port of Bandjermasin, where Mr. Bock disembarked for Java. A second narrative contained in this volume is that of his "Journneys in Sumatra," in August, 1878, along the mountainous west coast, which displays much beautiful scenery and many curiosities of zoological research.

Absorbing is not too strong an epithet to apply to such a book as Men and Events of my Time in India: by Sir Richard Temple, Bart., etc. (John Murray), a large handsome volume, containing a most interesting but quite unvarnished account of persons encountered and experiences undergone during a long and successful career in India. The author, who has left his own mark upon the history of our Indian Empire, began his course of notable, if not brilliant, service in the East thirty-five years ago as a "writer" under "John Company," and in 1877 "received charge of the Governorship of Bombay" after having fulfilled high functions as Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. It stands to reason, then, that he must have been brought into personal communication with some of the most illustrious among the many illustrious administrators of Indian affairs, as well as with the chief performers of the most splendid military achievements at a very momentous and critical period; and as he confines himself, for the most part, to persons and things with whom and in which he was himself more or less intimately engaged, his narrative, his sketches, and his judgments are invested with the peculiar charm and weight which, when the narrator, sketcher, and judge has unimpeachable credentials in each capacity, belong to whatever we receive at first hand. It would be impossible to convey within reasonable compass an adequate idea of the many subjects upon which an opinion is expressed, of the many events which are more or less briefly described, and of the characters which are more or less fully delineated in the volume; but it is possible to mention certain facts which will whet the appetite of readers and show them what an abundant and what a tempting feast is set before them. Let it be premised that there is a copious index, which will of itself suffice to convince anybody who runs an eye through it that the book is a delightful if not a dainty dish to set before a king or a commoner. The most interesting portions of the work, however, are undoubtedly those in which the "stars of India," to use the expression in more than one sense, with a sort of literal as well as figurative meaning, are the subject of discourse or of simple description. It is a grand series of constellations, made up not only of English but also of "native" luminaries. For the writer was happily inspired when it occurred to him that his "countrymen desire to know something in regard to the character of those native princes who have proved themselves the loyal feudatories of the empire," something also about "eminent native statesmen," something, too, about "native worthies who are well known to the European community in India," something, moreover, about "the missionaries whose talents were equal to their zeal and piety." A pretty full and very sympathetic account is given of James Thomason, one of our earliest and best provincial Governors in India, a wonderful man, whose deeds and merits have hitherto been insufficiently appreciated, for want of information, by Englishmen at home; and a fair amount of space is devoted to the career of another provincial Governor, Sir Bartle Frere, whose principles of policy are said to have borne much resemblance to those of James Thomason, and with whose qualities and administrative ability we are all well acquainted. The best testimony to the worth of James Thomason is contained in the following statements:—"John Lawrence in the days of his greatness would often declare that as a civil administrator he dropped his flag to Thomason;" and "when receiving decorations in after years, Montgomery (Sir Robert) said that he felt almost unworthy, because Thomason had died undecorated." The author of the volume, having had "the advantage of serving in a confidential capacity" under both James Wilson and Samuel Laing, the former of whom may be considered very justly to have fallen a victim to his patriotic exertions, has explained, with some detail, the financial policy of those two eminent servants of their country, and has narrated, with all the accuracy which official intimacy enabled him to employ, the story of Mr. Wilson's short but useful term of life, closed by a premature death, in India. Nor are the legal "stars" forgotten; the names of Sir Henry Sumner Maine and of Sir James Fitzjames Stephen are duly honoured, and a proper tribute is paid for services rendered by those learned but very dissimilar jurists. But one "star" differs from another "star" in glory; and it is, therefore, only in accordance with the fitness of things that the most conspicuous places should be assigned to such distinguished personages as the "noble pair" of Lawrences, John and Henry or Henry and John, and "the greatest Governors-General that have ever held supreme command in India," among whom one of those two brothers asserts his position of right beside Dalhousie, the "Great Proconsul," beside "Clemency Canning," and beside the murdered Mayo. Nor are the administrations of Lord Hardinge, Lord Northbrook, and Lord Lytton passed over without notice; and even Lord Ellenborough, though not strictly within the author's range, receives a word or two; whilst Lord Elgin, his work, his short tenure of office, and his sudden, untimely death are dealt with succinctly but appreciatively. It is Lord Lawrence on whom the most exhaustive treatment is bestowed, and naturally; for the author acted "as his Secretary in the Punjab, next as the Foreign Secretary to his Government of India, and then as his Financial Councillor." The author draws a contrast, as he would be likely to do, between the India of 1847 and the India of 1881; and, though the result of the process is not calculated to raise an English reader's spirits to a dangerous height, it appears that there is a certainty of improvement effected, and some hope of a good time coming: "when India, as she exists," says the author, "is compared in imagination with India as she ought to be, a feeling of despair supervenes. But courage revives when a retrospect is taken of the latest and most progressive generation which has yet been seen." Unfortunately, there is a doubt whether the time will ever arrive when the "native" and the European shall have ceased to regard one another with that feeling which prevented the writer of a certain epigram from being drawn towards Dr. Fell; and that feeling is a sad hindrance between the would-be improver and the won't-be-improved.

A military correspondent, to whose pencil the readers of this Journal have been indebted for many acceptable sketches, has collected some "Leaves from an Officer's Note-book," under the title, On and Off Duty, making a volume of not insignificant appearance (published by Messrs. W. H. Allen and Co.). Captain Samuel Pasfield Oliver, late of the Royal Artillery, and now on the Reserve List, a member of several scientific societies, is the officer to whom we have alluded; and his travelling journals, with subsequent notes and comments, from the year 1860 to 1867 inclusive, will be found to contain a great variety of interesting geographical and ethnological details. These are divided, perhaps a little too ambitiously, into three main regions of the earth, "Turan," "Lemuria," and "Columbia." The first-named portion of Captain Oliver's personal observations is limited to China and Japan, where the lapse of twenty-one years, since his visit to Peking and to Yokohama, may be expected to have put many remarks out of date. "Lemuria," which is not to be found in the Atlas, is the appellation given by some authorities in physical geography and comparative zoology to a supposed lost Continent, of which Madagascar and a few smaller islands in the Indian Ocean are the only visible remains, but which is regarded as the habitation of a peculiar family of the animal world. The Mascarene Isles, that is to say, Mauritius or the Isle of France, Réunion or Bourbon, and Rodriguez, with the Seychelles, and scattered lesser groups, added to Madagascar, would seem to compose this geographical division, which certainly does not belong to Africa, and scarcely to Asia or to Australia, by community of natural productions. Captain Oliver's descriptions of these islands, and remarks concerning what he saw and learnt there, form not the least valuable part of this volume. He has a keen eye for all that is characteristic and humorous or curious in the manners and habits of the native population; and by his frequent quotations from ancient and modern literature, and his reference to homely or foreign examples, these matters are shown as they appear in the light of a wide experience of human nature. The third division of the volume, "Columbia," relates to his journeys and labours on the Central American Isthmus, the San Juan river, Lake Nicaragua and Lake Managua, where Captain Oliver was employed in 1867 with a party intent on pioneering for a navigable route from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. It is not at all unlikely that this route will soon again be brought into notice, as an alternative to the Panama Ship Canal of M. de Lesseps; and the accurate descriptive notes of Captain Oliver will then be perused with close attention. In the meantime, we can recommend all three parts of his collection of journals as pleasant and instructive reading. The volume is adorned with thirty-five wood-engravings, several of which appeared long since in this Journal, and others, of a botanical character, in the Gardener's Chronicle. Mr. J. G. Baker, of Kew Gardens, has contributed a scientific chapter on the natural history of Madagascar.

A lively descriptive writer, Mr. F. Francis, in two volumes bearing the alliterative title, War, Waves, and Wanderings (Sampson Low and Co.), presents a rapid succession of sketches of travel and adventure in Zululand, Madagascar, Zanzibar, East Africa, the Seychelles, Singapore, Siam, Cochin China, Japan, California, Alaska, and the Aleutian Islands. Here is geographical variety enough, in all conscience; and Mr. Francis, who first meets us as a War Special Correspondent with Lord Chelmsford's army, immediately upon the lamented death of the Prince Imperial, in June, 1879, was fortunate, after the crowning victory of Ulundi, which also he narrates, in a speedy chance of visiting many other parts of the world. He was thus favoured by the friendship of the owner of the steam-yacht Lancashire Witch, then lying in harbour at Durban, Port Natal; in which, having done with the "War," he embarked on the "Waves and Wanderings," and enjoyed many months of cruising about the Indian Ocean, the Malay and East Asiatic coasts, and the North Pacific, with frequent inland sporting excursions, all to the great entertainment of his readers. For his frank high spirits and gust of novelty, in the experiences of such diverse climates, scenes, and nations of men, will be found contagious; and he has plenty of diverting personal anecdotes to beguile the tediousness of a long sea voyage. Of shooting and fishing, and the pursuit of different kinds of game by the eager sportsmen of this jovial party, Mr. Francis has much to relate, and some of his observations will be interesting to the naturalist. The account of his sojourn in Alaska, the north-western part of the American Continent, formerly Russian territory, but now belonging to the United States, occupies a hundred pages of the second volume. This portion of the book contains a good deal of comparatively new information, at least such as we have not often encountered in preceding narratives of travel. There is some real knowledge to be gained by following the author's devious course to those remote places, Kodiak Isle, Cook's Inlet, Chignik Bay, Port Moller, and the Seal Islands, which have not yet been too frequently described. But Mr. Francis everywhere contrives to be amusing, with which most readers will be well contented.

The award of the prize medals offered annually for competition by the Royal Geographical Society among candidates from the various public schools has been made as follows:—The gold medal for physical geography is awarded to Hubert L. Smith, of the Bristol Grammar School; and that for political geography to Frank H. Becker, of Dulwich College. The silver medal for physical geography to Albert R. Sharp, of Dulwich College; and that for political geography to Sydney C. Farlow, of Harrow School. Candidates from Marlborough, Dulwich, the London International, and Liverpool Colleges are distinguished by "honourable mention" with certificates.

OBITUARY.

VISCOUNT NETTERVILLE.

The Right Hon Arthur James, eighth Viscount Netterville, of Dowth, in the county of Meath, in the Peerage of Ireland, died at St. Alban's place, on the 7th inst., at an advanced age. He was eldest and last surviving son of Mr. Robert William Netterville, of Cruiceth, in the county of Meath, by Mary, his wife, daughter of Mr. John Bernard, of Ballynagar, and in early life served for some years in the 3rd and 12th Regiments. In 1867 he was adjudged by the House of Lords to be entitled to the ancient viscounty of Netterville, conferred on his ancestor, Nicholas Netterville, of Dowth, April 3, 1622. He married, Oct. 27, 1841, Constantia Frances, second daughter of Sir Edward Joseph Smythe, Bart., of Eshe Hall, in the county of Durham, and by her, who died at Paris, Jan. 21, 1870, leaves an only child, Frances Constantia, wife of M. Charles Viditz. By his Lordship's death without male issue one of the most historic titles of the Irish Peerage becomes extinct.

SIR RICHARD THOMAS GILPIN, BART.

Sir Richard Thomas Gilpin, Bart., of Hockliffe Grange, in the county of Bedford, J.P. and D.L., Lieutenant-Colonel in the Army, and Hon. Colonel of the Bedfordshire Militia, died at his seat, near Leighton Buzzard, on the 8th inst. He was born Jan. 12, 1801, the only son of Lieutenant-Colonel Richard Gilpin, of Hockliffe, by Sarah, his wife, daughter of Mr. William Wilkinson, and was educated at Rugby, and at Christ's College, Cambridge. He early entered the Army, served in the 14th Light Dragoons and in the Rifle Brigade; was High Sheriff of Bedfordshire in 1850, and represented that county in Parliament, as a Conservative, from 1851 to 1880. He was created a Baronet Feb. 19, 1876.

Sir Richard married, Dec. 13, 1831, Louisa, daughter of General Gore Browne, but by her (who died in 1871) had no issue. His title consequently becomes extinct.

SIR HORATIO HENRY WRAXALL, BART.

Sir Horatio Henry Wraxall, fourth Baronet, whose death is announced, was born Dec. 17, 1832, the second son of Lieutenant Charles Edward Wraxall, by Ellen, his wife, daughter of Mr. John Mudden, and succeeded, at the death of his brother, Sir Frederick Charles Lascelles Wraxall, June 11, 1865, to the baronetcy conferred in 1813 on his grandfather, Sir Nathaniel W. Wraxall, the author of "Historical Memoirs." He married, Feb. 28, 1855, Laura, second daughter of Mr. Edward Hammond, of Richmond, Surrey, but leaves no issue. His brother and heir is now Sir Morville Nathaniel Wraxall, fifth Baronet.

ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM CLIFFORD, BART., C.B.

Admiral Sir William John Cavendish Clifford, Bart., C.B., died at Bournemouth on the 11th inst. He was born Oct. 12, 1814, the eldest son of Admiral Sir Augustus William James Clifford, C.B., Bart. (so created Aug. 4, 1838), for a long time Usher of the Black Rod, by the Lady Elizabeth Frances, his wife, sister of John, fourth Marquis Townshend. He received his education at Eton, entered the Royal Navy in 1829, and became successively Commander in 1847, Rear-Admiral in 1865, Vice-Admiral in 1871, and Admiral in 1877. Sir William succeeded his father Feb. 8, 1877. He died unmarried, and the baronetcy consequently devolves on his next brother, now Sir Robert Cavendish Spencer Clifford, third Baronet, Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod in her Majesty's Household, Colonel late Grenadier Guards. He was born in 1815, and married in 1839, Emmeline, only child of the late Mr. Atwell Lowe, a Judge in India. The late Baronet's younger brother, Charles Cavendish, was formerly M.P., for the Isle of Wight and for Newport, and from 1854 to 1857 Private Secretary to Lord Palmerston.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Charles Moore Luckraft, Senior Lieutenant H.M.S. Cormorant, at Espiritu Santo, New Hebrides. He was second son of Captain Charles Maxwell Luckraft, Governor of the Naval Prison, Lewes.

Mr. Edward Stephens, of Trevornan, J.P. and D.L. for the county of Cornwall, on the 7th inst. He was eldest surviving son of the Rev. Dorell Stephens.

Sarah, Lady Barry, at her residence in Cleveland-square, in her eighty-third year. Her Ladyship was widow of the great architect, Sir Charles Barry, R.A., and daughter of Mr. Samuel Rowsell, of London.

Caroline, Lady Crompton, on the 12th inst., at Dorset-square, aged seventy-six. Her Ladyship was daughter of Mr. Thomas Fletcher, of Liverpool, and widow of Sir Charles Crompton, one of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. She was married in 1832, and left a widow in 1865.

Mr. Edward Duncan, one of the oldest members of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, on the 11th inst., at his residence, Upper Park-road, Haverstock-hill. His larger and more important works are chiefly marine subjects. We shall give Mr. Duncan's portrait next week.

Lady Henrietta Scott-Bentinck, at Naples. Her Ladyship was born April 21, 1798, the eldest daughter of William Henry, fourth Duke of Portland, by Henrietta, his wife, eldest daughter and coheir of General John Scott, of Balcomie, Fifeshire; and succeeded at the death of her brother, the late Duke, to his Grace's Ayrshire estate.

It is officially announced that enrolled members of the volunteer force who may be injured on duty and rendered thereby incapable of resuming their occupations, will in future be allowed a gratuity not exceeding 3s. 6d. per day, and for a period not longer than six months. The allowance will not be given while the patient may be in a military hospital.

Emigration returns for March show a large increase over the corresponding period of last year, the total number of persons who left the Mersey being 20,410. The foreign element predominated, and nearly equalled the English, Irish, and Scotch combined. The United States took 18,566; Canada, 1576; Australia, 14; South America, 106; the East Indies, 54; the West Indies, 30; China, 5; West Coast of Africa, 49; and the Cape of Good Hope, 10.

There was some delay in the publication of Brentano's Chess Monthly last month, and the number for March only came to hand last week. Mr. Reichelm, of Philadelphia, now edits the games, and the selection this month includes ten hitherto unpublished games played by Mr. Morphy. The problem department is, as usual, marked by variety and excellence; and among the other contents will be found interesting sketches of Mr. Richardson and the late Mr. Bodeu. The April number is promised for the 15th inst., and should therefore be in the hands of English readers in the course of next week.

Last week the imports of cattle and meat from the United States included 326 cattle, 6595 quarters of beef, and 1374 carcasses of mutton.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Aug. 29, 1874), with a codicil (dated Sept. 2 following), of the Right Hon. Catherine, Dowager Countess of Essex, the widow of George, fifth Earl of Essex, late of No. 9, Belgrave-square, who died on Feb. 22 last, was proved on the 6th inst. by Miss Esther Matilda Johnstone, the niece and sole executrix, to whom she gives, devises, appoints, and bequeaths all her real and personal estate absolutely. The value of the personal estate amounts to over £71,000.

The will (dated Feb. 24, 1880) of Mr. Louis Cohen, late of the Stock Exchange, and of No. 84, Gloucester-place, Portman-square, who died on the 15th ult., was proved on the 8th inst. by Lionel Louis Cohen and Alfred Louis Cohen, the sons, Arthur Montefiore Sebag, the grandson, and Francis Alfred Lucas, the great-nephew, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £623,000. The testator bequeaths his Ark (Aron Hakodesh) to his executors, for such person or persons, institution or institutions, as they may think fit; his two largest Siphri Torah (Manuscripts of Hebrew Pentateuch), with all the paraphernalia, to the Wardens of the Great Synagogue, Duke's-place, for the use, subject to certain conditions, of the said synagogue; his two smaller Siphri Torah and all his Hebrew printed books to his son Lionel; the remainder of his books between his four other sons; all his plate between his five sons; his jewellery between his three surviving daughters and his son-in-law, the husband of his deceased daughter; £5000 to the United Synagogue, the interest to be distributed by the council among the Jewish poor of the metropolis; £500 to the Great Synagogue; £300 to the Jewish Board of Guardians; £200 each to the Jewish Hospital and Orphan Asylum, Lower Norwood, the Jews' Free School, Bell-lane, Spitalfields, and the London Hospital; £100 each to the Benevolent Fund for Decayed Members of the Stock Exchange and the Jewish Poor in the Holy Land; £50 each to the Metropolitan Free Hospital, Devonshire-square, and St. Mary's Hospital; and several other legacies to Jewish charities and institutions, for the Jewish poor, and to the Incumbent of the parish in which he resides, to be distributed among the poor generally. He makes up the fortunes of each of his daughters, Mrs. Adelaide Sebag, Mrs. Henrietta Moses, Mrs. Julia Jessel, and Mrs. Ellen Montagu, with the amount settled upon them on their respective marriages, to £35,000, and in the case of his daughter Mrs. Henrietta Moses, who predeceased him, such money is to be held upon trust for the benefit of her husband and children. Legacies are also bequeathed to godchildren, grandchildren, sister, executors, nephews, nieces, daughters-in-law, sons-in-law, Sir Moses Montefiore, the Chief Rabbi, clerks in the employ of his firm, domestic servants, and others. A special bequest of £30,000 is made to each of his sons, Henry, Lionel, Alfred, Nathaniel, and Benjamin, and the residue of his property, real and personal, is given to or upon trust for his said five sons. All transactions in which he or his firm may have been concerned on the Stock Exchange or otherwise, and whether binding and lawful or not, are particularly directed to be paid by his executors in the usual course of business and according to the custom of the Stock Exchange.

The will (dated Feb. 10, 1869), with two codicils (dated July 2 and Aug. 11, 1881), of Mr. Alfred Kitching, late of Darlington, who died on Feb. 13 last, was proved on the 13th ult. at the Durham district registry by Mrs. Mary Janson Kitching, the widow, John Kitching, the son, Arthur Lucas, and William Harding, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £344,000. The testator leaves to his wife his household furniture, plate, pictures, effects, horses and carriages, and for life £3000 per annum, his property known as Elmfield, and certain house property at Darlington; £200 to the Friends' school at Ayton; £100 each to the Darlington Hospital and Dispensary, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the Friends' Foreign Mission Association; to his son John his share of the goodwill and capital of Messrs. Fry, Janson, and Co., and the North Bitchburn Coal Company; to his son Alfred Edward his share of the goodwill and capital of Messrs. Charles Janson, Son, and Co.; and to his son Henry £10,000. There are specific devises of various freehold properties to each of his said sons; and the residue of his real and personal estate is to be divided between them.

The will (dated Aug. 20, 1864) of Mr. Alexander Scrimgeour, late of No. 18, Old Broad-street, and of "Whisper," Midhurst, Sussex, who died on Feb. 1 last at sea, was proved on the 5th inst. by Mrs. Anne Esther Scrimgeour, the widow, and sole executrix, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £338,000. The testator gives all his real and personal estate to his wife for her own absolute use and benefit.

The will (dated Nov. 17, 1880) of Mr. William Roundell, late of Gledstone, Yorkshire, who died on Sept. 21 last, has been proved at the Wakefield district registry by Charles Savile Roundell, the brother, and Thomas William Lloyd, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £140,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife, Mrs. Harriet Jane Roundell, £2000, and the interest for life of certain bonds and Stock; at her death such bonds and Stock are to be divided between his nephews and nieces, George Hotham, William Hotham, Mary Hotham, and Lucy Hotham, and Frederick Thompson and Frank Thompson; to his second son, Charles Selborne, £50,000, in addition to the portion charged by settlement on his real estate in favour of younger children; a further sum of £50,000 is to be laid out in the purchase of real estate near Gledstone, if possible, but not in Ireland, to go with the settled family estates, and certain plate is also to go therewith as a heirloom. The residue of the personalty the testator gives to his eldest son, Richard Foulis.

The will (dated May 3, 1880) of Mr. Christopher Russell Brown, late of No. 53, Tredegar-square, Mile-end, who died on Jan. 23 last, was proved on the 24th ult. by Michael Brown, the brother, and Miss Emily Brown, the sister, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to more than £51,000. The testator bequeaths £1000 each to the National Life-Boat Institution, the London Hospital, Mile-end-road; the Newcastle-on-Tyne Infirmary, the Shipwrecked Fishermen and Mariners' Royal Benevolent Society, Hibernia Chambers, London Bridge; the Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum, Snarebrook, Essex; the London Orphan Asylum, and the Royal Alfred Aged Merchant Seamen's Institution;—a like sum of £1000 to be distributed among the Training Ships on the River Thames, between London and Gravesend; £500 to the Ophthalmic Hospital, Moorfields; £200 to the City of London Truss Society; £10,000 and all his household furniture and effects to his sister Emily; and legacies to relatives and others. The residue of his property is to be divided between his said sister and his brother Michael.

The will (dated Dec. 4, 1880) of Captain Frederick William Henegage, R.E., late of Hainton, Lincolnshire, who died on Oct. 31 last, at New York, was proved on the 16th ult. by Edward Henegage, the acting executor, the personal estate exceeding £19,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Ann Lawrence Mary Henegage, £1000 and his furniture, household effects, horses and carriages; to his executor, £50; and the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for his wife for life, and then for his children.

OFFICE.

Royal Italian Opera, Covent-garden.

PROSPECTUS.

The death of the late Mr. Frederick Gye having necessitated the realisation and division of his estate amongst his family, this Company has been formed for the purpose of combining the two Italian Operas in London, and for purchasing from Mr. Gye's Executors the Covent Garden Opera House and Floral Hall, with the whole of the plant and contents, and also the lease and goodwill of Her Majesty's Opera House, with scenery, costumes, music, furniture, &c., the whole of which latter the Executors have agreed to purchase for the above purpose.

2. The Covent Garden Opera House, the Floral Hall adjoining, and the buildings in Hart-street (which together cover an area of about 58,000 square feet), are held on leases direct from his Grace the Duke of Bedford, K.G., for a term, of which about sixty-six years are unexpired, at a ground rent of £1210 12s. per annum, or at the rate of about 6d. per square foot; and these leases, including all the boxes and seats, except the box belonging to the ground landlord and the boxes and seats hereafter specified, together with the goodwill of the business, and the entire stock of music, scenery, dresses, armour, furniture, properties, and other plant for the mounting of the repertoire, which now comprises more than fifty operas, will be made over to the Company by the Executors of the late Mr. Frederick Gye as a going concern.

3. A lease of Her Majesty's Theatre, commencing in last year (1881) was granted to the Executors by the present Crown lessees, for the whole of their unexpired term under the Crown—viz., 30 years, at an annual rental of £2000, free from any existing rights, except the reservation of two boxes by the lessor. The average rent for which this theatre lets for the various periods of the year would be sufficient to pay the above annual rental, and insurance, taxes, &c., even should the Company merely sub-let the theatre, instead of using it themselves for any of the various entertainments for which such a theatre is suitable.

The above lease is based upon the decision of the High Court of Justice in the action of Quilter v. Mapleson; but should that decision be reversed on appeal, the old lease held by Mr. Mapleson, which has about ten years to run (upon which a ground-rent only of £1934 6s. is payable) will be handed over to the Company, subject to twelve property boxes and twenty-eight stalls, reserved from the lease.

The arrangements now published with regard to Her Majesty's Theatre will be carried on by the Company upon its formation.

4. The following is a description of the buildings and property and interests acquired by the Company, by which will be seen the independent security which the shareholders have for their subscribed capital, irrespective of the annual profits of the business.

(A). The buildings known as Covent-Garden Theatre and the Floral Hall attached, the storerooms in Hart-street, all built by the late Mr. F. Gye, together with the before-mentioned lease (66 years unexpired); the buildings taken at cost, and the lease at 20 years' purchase of the valued rental, and after allowing for sinking fund for redemption of capital.

(B). The machinery, chandeliers, gas mains and fittings, water supply and fire mains, heating apparatus, and other fittings, valued at

(C). The scenery, costumes, properties, music, armour, and accessories for the repertoire of over fifty operas, valued (after allowing for depreciation) at

(D). Scenery, costumes, properties, furniture, music, &c., at Her Majesty's Theatre

(E). In addition to the above, the Lease of Her Majesty's Theatre and the Goodwill of both Theatres are estimated at (F). An agreement made with Mr. Mapleson, whereby he has agreed to give his exclusive services to the Company for a period of ten years, and to undertake to manage and conduct, on behalf of the Company, the operatic business in the United States, which hitherto has been very profitable, and for which his great experience eminently fits him.

(G). The benefit of all the agreements with artists and others, which Messrs. Gye have acquired, together with all rights as to performance of operas, music, &c.

(H). The benefit of an undertaking by the Messrs. Gye not to carry on any operatic undertaking in opposition to the Company.

5. In settling the terms of purchase, the Directors have been able to arrange that £80,000, part of the sum hitherto secured on Covent Garden Theatre, shall remain on mortgage at 4 per cent, and that the holders of three boxes and six stalls shall, subject to indemnity in respect of the said mortgage, retain their seats, in lieu of being bought out in common with the other shareholders. These few seats make no sensible difference in the average nightly takings of so large a theatre as Covent Garden, containing, as it does, 105 boxes and 500 orchestra stalls.

6. The mortgage is redeemable by the Company at any time.

7. The capital of the Company (viz., £200,000) is appropriated as follows, viz.:

(A). For the purchase of the whole of the above properties and interests in both Operas Houses (subject to the mortgage of £80,000), and to the above boxes and stalls—cash

Fully paid ordinary shares

Fully paid founders' shares

(B). Reserved for working capital by the Company

8. The Company will thus have the virtual control of Italian operatic performances in London, in all the principal towns in Great Britain and the United States, for which latter branch of the company's business most important and advantageous arrangements are almost complete (thereby providing engagements for the artists nearly all the year round).

9. The Covent Garden Opera House was built with a view to the interior arrangements, as to seats, &c., being easily adapted to the requirements of pantomime, concerts, and other like entertainments in the autumn and winter, during which seasons it lets on very advantageous terms.

10. The books of Covent-Garden Opera have been thoroughly examined by Messrs. R. Mackay and Co., Chartered Accountants, of No. 3, Lombury, and show that the average annual profit for the six years immediately preceding the death of the late Mr. Gye was upwards of £15,500 for that theatre alone, quite irrespective of the business done during those years at Her Majesty's Theatre, which would now have also to be taken into consideration. Mr. Gye's sudden death, occurring as it did, shortly before the Opera Season of 1879, and other exceptional causes in the years 1879 and 1880, occasioned a falling off in the revenue of those two years, but during the year 1881 there was a large increase in the general receipts over the two above years, and the subscriptions for that season were the highest ever obtained.

11. The following estimate has been prepared by Mr. Gye of the profits of the business to be carried on by the company, calculated after paying expenses and outgoings of every kind:—

In the year 1880, the only year in which the combination of the two Italian Operas has ever yet been effected, which was at Covent-Garden Theatre (as permanently secured by the present undertaking), the profits of the Italian Opera Season alone (extending a little over three months) amounted to £22,000.

Assuming however, that two thirds only of this sum were to be realised, say

The average rents for the winter months at which Covent-Garden Theatre lets amount to £2000, and this sum may be taken as what would be received supposing the Company let the Theatre, instead of working it and receiving the extra profits themselves.

The alterations made last year in the re-arrangement of seats and price admit of an additional annual profit of £19,000.

The average nightly letting of these seats is over two thirds of their number; but taking only two thirds, the annual increase will amount to

The operatic and concert tours in the principal towns in Great Britain will produce, at a very low estimate

A careful estimate has been made for the undertaking in America and the United States, and a net annual profit of upwards of £20,000 may be fairly expected.

Assuming that about one half only is realised

No sum has been entered on account of profit from Her Majesty's Theatre, as the amount would depend on the particular uses to which the theatre might be put, as explained in paragraph 3.

From this profit of

Or over 11 per cent on the ordinary share capital of £190,000, after payment to the holders of the founders' shares of their proportion of the surplus profits.

12. Shareholders to the amount of twenty-five shares and upwards will (subject to such regulations as shall from time to time be determined by the Board) be entitled to a reduction of 10 per cent on the published prices of admission to all operatic performances and concerts given by the Company in this country and the United States, or elsewhere, as purchasers of tickets for any single entertainment, and to a deduction of 20 per cent on the amount of their subscription should they be subscribers for the London season, or for any series of performances or concerts, not less than twenty in number, out of London.

13. An agreement has been prepared and will be entered into between Messrs. Gye and the Company, in which are recited the arrangements for acquiring the different interests comprised in the agreement.

14. There are various contracts connected with the ordinary business of the two houses, such as artists' engagements, rights of representations of operas, &c., all valuable to the Company, but the parties to which cannot, it is obvious, be set out, and applicants for shares must be considered as having waived this being done.

15. Mr. Ernest Gye has agreed to act as Managing Director of the Company.

16. The above-mentioned contracts and agreements, the accounts, report and the estimates of the value of the properties, together with the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, can be inspected at the offices of the solicitors.

If no allotment is made the amount payable on application will be returned in full.

Applications for shares to be made to the Bankers.

Prospectuses and forms of application can be had of the Bankers, or the Brokers, or at the offices of the Company.

"Paris, Nov. 4, 1878.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the case with which gradations of sound can be produced from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to very requirement of the pianist."

"Ch. Gounod."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Paris, Sept. 8, 1878.

"We, the undersigned, certify that, after having examined the pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878, we find that the pianos belong to the Grand Piano of the house of Brinsmead."

"D. MASQUÉ,
"Chevalier ANTOINE DE MONTREUIL, Court
Placé to the Emperor of Germany."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"I have pleasure in expressing my opinion that the Paris Exhibition Model Grand Pianofortes of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons are unsurpassed. The tone is deliciously sweet, sustained, and extraordinarily powerful; the touch responds to the faintest and to the most trying strains on it, and the workmanship is simply perfect."

"W. KUNA."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Illustrated London News."

"The principle of the Brinsmead firm is to give the best piano of its kind the best of materials, the best of care, the best of taste, and the best of finish, and this is why the factory in Kentish Town sends down to Wigmore-street so many pianos perfect in scale, sustained in tone, elastic in bulk, with equal and responsive touch, and, in fact, as near as possible to that ideal which all musicians must require—'A thing of beauty that is a joy for ever.'"

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily Chronicle."

"In tone the instrument is exceedingly rich and sweet, and in touch the very perfection of lightness. Messrs. Brinsmead may certainly be congratulated upon their success."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Morning Advertiser."

"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily News."

"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims notice, not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but specially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any note or notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus, these notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away and, with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant staccato passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater action,' a speciality of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid repetition of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general being such that glissando passages can be executed with such perfect ease as to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding-board, another improvement being the system of bridging, by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power, its massive structure rendering it less liable to get out of tune than usual; and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

ELKINGTON and CO.

ELECTRO-PLATE,

THE LATE LIEUT.-GENERAL CANNON.

This distinguished officer, who died at Folkestone on the 5th inst., aged seventy-one, will be remembered as having borne his part in the Russian war of 1854 and 1855. Robert Cannon first served in the 40th Madras Infantry, and was with that regiment in the Coorg campaign of 1834. In the following year he raised 500 men in Devonshire for the British Auxiliary Legion of Spain, and was appointed Major in the 6th Scotch Regiment. He was engaged in many actions during the Carlist civil war of Spain, from 1835 to 1837, for which he was decorated with the Cross of the First Class of the Order of St. Ferdinand, and the insignia of a Knight of the Order of Charles III. He became Lieutenant-Colonel of the 3rd or Royal Westminster Light Infantry Regiment of Middlesex Militia May 6, 1853, and was appointed by the Earl of Clarendon to proceed to Turkey with a staff of British officers for the purpose of serving with the Turkish Army. Early in 1854, as "Behram Pasha," he joined the army at Shumla, commanded by Omar Pasha. In June of that year, when Silistria was hard pressed by the Russians, and preparing to surrender, he (without receiving orders) threw himself, at the head of 6000 men, into the fortress for the relief of the garrison, and the Russians soon afterwards raised the siege; he then marched on Turtakan to oppose a threatened attack from the Russians. He was at the battle of Giurgevo, where the Turks gained a complete victory over the Russians. He persuaded Hassan Pasha immediately afterwards to seize and occupy the heights of Stabodrie, where Omar Pasha, on his arrival, formed an intrenched camp; was at the occupation of Giurgevo and Bucharest in 1854; took a division of the Turkish army in December, 1854, to Eupatoria, where he was incessantly engaged in strengthening and restoring the defences of the place; accompanied Omar Pasha's force to Sebastopol, and was present at the bombardment in April, 1855. General Cannon received four medals with that of the Crimea, and in October, 1858, the Second Class of the Order of the Medjidie from the Sultan.

"THE ORPHAN."

The picture we have engraved from the late exhibition at the French Gallery, Pall-mall, presents a well-chosen incident for a work of homely genre. And not less happily selected is the locale where this little scene of a domestic drama is enacted. It is a Breton chaumière, with its characteristically thick walls, massive timbers, and small casement; its image of the Virgin and Child, and its patron saint with the pot of sweet-smelling herbs placed beneath, dimly seen in the background. In such a cottage you may often see pieces of fine old carving, beyond the apparent means of the occupant—such as the cradle in the picture, and the mantelpiece with its columnar jambs. These carvings often date from the seventeenth century, and are jealously kept in their possession by a peasantry singularly attached to olden associations, customs, and traditions. The same sentiment has preserved the costumes, both male and female, from an equally remote period, and has rendered Brittany a favourite haunt of artists in search of the picturesque—so little of it either in garb or life being left in Europe. Into such a home is brought that fatherless and motherless little girl; kindly welcome and sympathy are on every face—if we except the baby that clings to its mother's neck more in fear of a strange figure than in jealousy. You may even form, if you will, a romance in the future between the urchin on the right and his newly-adopted sister, as they grow up together, for grow up together they surely will. The subject may be taken to illustrate the proverb of "The poor helping the poor." For very likely this humble family, landed proprietor though its head may be, lead what an Irish tenant would consider a hard life. We need say no more, unless it be to praise the excellent composition, broad treatment (both obvious in our engraving), and the good colour of the original. R. Wylie, the painter of this charming picture, was an American by birth, but received his art education in France, and lived and painted in Brittany. His death, about six years back, at a comparatively early age, was much deplored.

THE LATE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL CANNON.

LIVERPOOL CONSERVATIVE CLUBS.

The Conservative party demonstration last week at Liverpool was associated with the new building of the Liverpool Conservative Club in Dale-street. This building has advanced in its erection as far as the first floor, but the corner-stone was laid by the Marquis of Salisbury on Wednesday week. Amongst those present, besides Lord Salisbury and Sir S. Northcote, were Sir R. A. Cross, Lord Lathom, the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, the Right Hon. H. C. Raikes, M.P., Lord Sandon, M.P., Sir Thomas Edwardes Moss, Colonel Ireland Blackburne, M.P., the Hon. A. Egerton, Major-General Feilden, M.P., Mr. Gilbert Moss, Mr. D. MacIver, M.P., Mr. E. Whitley, M.P., Mr. A. B. Forwood, Mr. Macgregor Laird (chairman of the club), the Right Hon. E. Gibson, M.P., and a large number of members of the club and other local Conservatives. The stone which was to be laid is placed at the angle of the building over the entrance. It is of Pentland marble, polished and inscribed with a few words commemorating the occasion. A temporary platform had been erected, upon which the speakers and other gentlemen stood in full view of the spectators in the street below. Mr. Macgregor Laird having welcomed Lord Salisbury on behalf of the club members, Mr. D. Ratcliffe, a member of the Building Committee, presented his Lordship with the trowel and mallet. The Marquis of Salisbury then duly laid the stone. The party then advanced to the edge of the platform, where Lord Sandon proposed a vote of thanks to the Marquis for his presence and the work he had performed. The speech of Lord Salisbury has been fully reported and commented upon in all the daily papers. We now give an illustration of the building, as it will appear when completed; the architects are Messrs. F. and G. Holme, of Westminster Chambers, Crosshall-street, Liverpool. This Conservative Club-house is at the corner of Dale-street and Cumberland-street, a central and convenient situation, and it is estimated that the premises will cost between £35,000 and £40,000 before they are completed.

On Friday Lord Salisbury and Sir Stafford Northcote paid a visit to the Junior Conservative Club, a young but rapidly-growing association, which bids fair to play a distinguished part in future political struggles in Liverpool. It was opened on March 31, 1881, and already numbers 500 members. At present it is in occupation of only temporary premises in Eberle-street; but a site has been secured, about fifty yards west of the senior club premises, and the architect, Mr. F. E. Murray, has furnished the design of a four-storey building, having a frontage on Dale-street and on Stanley-street, in fourteenth-century Gothic, modified to meet the requirements.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1882.

Near to the honoured grave of Sir Isaac Newton in Westminster Abbey, the mortal remains of Charles Robert Darwin, whose illness was hardly suspected ten days ago by the general public, were on Wednesday committed to the tomb. The eminent men in every walk of life—statesmen, scientists, artists, and divines—who were present at the simple obsequies of the great philosopher truly represented a mourning and grateful nation; and, indeed, the sorrowful regrets of the civilised world. Dean Bradley intuitively interpreted the general feeling in proposing that the Abbey should be the last resting-place of the venerable naturalist, whose faithful and patient application of the Baconian theory of induction has brought about a complete revolution in scientific thought. If Mr. Darwin had been cut off twenty years ago, it is safe to say no one would have had the temerity to suggest that his memory should have been so conspicuously honoured. Then a furious theological storm was raging around the modest scientist who, by his "Origin of Species" and theory of Evolution, challenged ancient traditions and gave a severe shock to time-honoured axioms. It was soon, however, discovered that Mr. Darwin was rather a patient investigator of facts than a daring speculator; and that, whatever might be his conclusions, the mass of facts he had collected with unparalleled industry and sagacity were an invaluable contribution to human knowledge. The panic created by his discoveries has gradually subsided; and science, "rich with the spoils of time," has at length come to be regarded, not as the enemy, but the handmaid of religion. The greatness of the revolution that has taken place in human thought and the abatement of honest but unreasoning alarm at modern discoveries are vividly illustrated by the profound homage paid to the deceased philosopher by the foremost orthodox divines of the day. That Evolution theory which a quarter of a century ago was denounced as leading to Materialism, is now recognised by Dr. Barry, preaching at Westminster Abbey, as in no way alien to the Christian religion; or, as Canon Liddon on Sunday last put the matter from the pulpit of St. Paul's Cathedral, "whether the creative action of God is manifested through catastrophes, as the phrase goes, or in progressive evolution, it is still His creative activity, and the really great questions beyond remain untouched." Darwin, who had the gift of silence in controversial questions, had also the happiness of living down the clamour created by his grand discoveries. Even where his theories have not been accepted, he has long since been recognised as a modest, reverent, and truthful searcher after truth, and at Darwin's death no one challenges the claim that the tomb of the foremost scientific man of the Victorian era should be alongside the grave "of the only other philosopher (Newton) in the past whose revolutionary effect on thought can at all be compared with his own."

Almost simultaneously with the news of Mr. Darwin's decease appeared a notable letter in the Times showing the inestimable benefits that flow from patient research in the field of medical science. Many years ago the investigations of the late Dr. Budd, of Bristol, led to the discovery that consumption of the lungs was due to the substance called "tubercle," and that the disease was strictly analogous to the ordinary infectious eruptive fevers, such as smallpox and the measles, and is therefore eminently contagious. Subsequent experiments have established that the fevers referred to are due to the growth within the body of minute parasites called bacilli. The researches of Dr. Koch, an eminent German physician, as explained by Professor Tyndall, have led him to the further conclusion that tubercle, which is the essence not only of pulmonary disease, but of some of the most formidable of the affections of the joints, may be mitigated as well as communicated by inoculation. It was the parasites in question that caused the splenic fever in cattle which M. Pasteur was able so successfully to mitigate by that means. If it be possible by scientific means to produce this class of diseases—which it is said are fatal to one-seventh of the human race—in a mild instead of a severe form, as in the case of vaccination for the smallpox, it is hardly too sanguine to hope that an antidote to consumption and to tuberculous diseases generally may ere long be found. May it not hereafter become as easy to ward off such fatal complaints by scientific appliances as it is to guard against typhoid fever by the avoidance of sewage-polluted water?

The wedding festivities at Windsor Castle on Thursday are a more cheerful, if not a more important theme than the discoveries of medical science. The unfavourable weather which attended the arrival on our shores of Princess Helen and her august relatives on Tuesday did not damp the heartiness of their reception by her Majesty's loyal subjects, or by the Royal family at Windsor. The Castle has witnessed many a Royal wedding since Queen Victoria ascended the throne, and it is pleasant to believe that on no previous occasion has the rejoicing been more cordial or the occasion more auspicious. The strong and deep sympathy evoked by the recent outrage on the Queen has augmented the general interest in an event which is so calculated to increase her domestic happiness by the accession of another adopted daughter. The brilliant scene in St. George's Chapel on Thursday did not differ materially from other historical events of which it has been the theatre, and in which the Queen's children have been the chief actors. But the youngest son has now followed the example of his elder brothers by entering the married state, and introducing to the British Court a charming young lady who, we may be sure, will not only adorn her new and brilliant sphere, but will co-operate with her happy husband in those public philanthropic objects, the prosecution of which, amid peculiar difficulties, has already gained his Royal Highness an honourable reputation. The cordial good wishes for his health and happiness that follow the Duke of Albany on this auspicious occasion are something more than the felicitations evoked by the marriage of her Majesty's youngest son. Prince Leopold has already made his mark as a public man. Following in the footsteps of his illustrious father, he has used a cultured intellect and a commanding position to assist in the social and educational elevation of his fellow-countrymen. We doubt not that this noble ambition will be a stimulus in the future, as it has been in the past, and that his Royal Highness in wedded life will add fresh lustre to a career that has begun with so much promise, and that offers great opportunities of future usefulness.

In these days even a Chancellor of the Exchequer has no prescriptive rights. On Monday night the statesman who combines that office with the Premiership was permitted to introduce his Budget at a comparatively early hour. Before six o'clock Mr. Gladstone had begun his Financial Statement, which, though not presenting any important features, occupied two hours in delivery. Growing expenditure and a sluggish revenue supplied the keynote of the speech. Most of the taxes have been less productive than might have been expected, especially Excise, which the Chancellor attributes not to trade depression, but to the more economical habits of the mass of the population. While the "Alcoholic Revenue" decidedly languishes, the deposits in savings banks steadily increase. Time was when the nation "drunk itself out of the Alabama difficulty." Now the nation declines to drink in order to swell the revenue. We cannot mourn over so hopeful a change. In reviewing the finances of the past year, Mr. Gladstone pointed out that we had been scrupulously paying our debts. The large sum of £3,842,000 is swallowed up by special war charges in Afghanistan and the Transvaal; and even if the Jingo fever does not return, we shall not be free from those unproductive burdens for three years to come. By the operation of the Sinking Fund, there is also a reduction of debt to the extent of £7,159,000, leaving our national liabilities—for it is well sometimes to look them full in the face—at an aggregate £763,166,000.

With a very slender surplus to carry over to the account of 1882-3, and an estimated expenditure of £84,630,000 (including about half a million for extra expenditure in governing Ireland, which will probably have to be supplemented), Mr. Gladstone does not see his way to any abatement of the public burdens, but would gladly bring about, if the Commons would help him, a restriction of expenditure. Still, the gross estimate is less by nearly a million than that of last year. His calculation of the prospective revenue is not sanguine. A total estimate of £84,935,000, including some extraordinary items, yields a bare surplus of £303,000, which suffices only to cover contingencies. Sorrowfully admitting that his scheme for a comprehensive reform of local government, including a County Government Bill, would have to stand over, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to meet the transfer of the highway rates to the Consolidated Fund by an increased duty on carriages, leaving what he calls the Death Duties to be dealt with hereafter, as well as his proposal to extend the annuities which expire in 1885. Three years hence the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being will have a golden opportunity. May Mr. Gladstone be that fortunate financier!

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

One of the usefulest public servants—perhaps the very usefulest, next to the late Sir Rowland Hill, whom this age has seen—has passed away in the person of Sir Henry Cole, K.C.B., some time Director of the South Kensington Museum and Inspector-General of the Science and Art Department. He is dead, at the ripe age of seventy-four. Exhaustive accounts of his long, brilliant, and eminently beneficent career, and a long list of the distinguished personages who were present at his funeral at Brompton Cemetery, have been published in the newspapers; and it was, indeed, only a simple act of justice that a high tribute of respect should be paid to the memory of this singularly many-sided, active, and energetic man. Brusque in mien, and slightly overbearing in manner, you were not apt—as Lord Granville hinted on a memorable occasion—to swear eternal friendship with Sir Henry Cole when you first became acquainted with him; but love at first sight is apt to cool as suddenly as it has kindled; and as you began to know Sir Henry better, you learned not only to appreciate his vast administrative capacity and his almost inexhaustible fertility of resource, but also to admire the man for his frankness, sincerity, and sterling worth.

Henry Cole was a Blue Coat boy—and, I should say, a contemporary there of my contemporary in this column, Peter Cunningham—and at a very early age he obtained a clerkship in the Record Office. An excellent apprenticeship for the laborious official life of his later years. He had been twenty years in the public service when he began to write, under the pseudonym of "Felix Summerly," a series of tasteful little art-handbooks—Hampton Court, Windsor, the National Gallery, and so forth. It is curious to remember that quite in the evening of his life he resumed his old nom de plume of "Felix Summerly" as editor of a quaint gastronomic farrago by Walker of "The Original." Among Sir Henry's other literary efforts must be noted the share which he had in editing the works of T. L. Peacock, the author of "Crotchet Castle," "Headlong Hall," "Nightmare Abbey," e tutti quanti—works about the wit and humour of which most people talk, but which comparatively few seem to have read.

If you will glance at Mr. Thackeray's poem on the Great Exhibition of 1851—not the May-Day Ode in the Times but the one in Punch—you will find the writer acknowledging his indebtedness to "Mr. Cole" for having given him a ticket which enabled him to see the show before its public opening. The May-Day Ode which appeared in the Times had been originally intended for Punch; the copy arrived too late; Mr. Mark Lemon declined to stop the press in order to insert the poem, which was taken away by its author in dudgeon to Printing House-square. I wonder whether that attentive biographer of Mr. Punch, Mr. Joseph Hatton, is aware of this little fact. And the stanza which Mr. Mark Lemon excised from the manuscript of Thomas Hood's "Song of the Shirt"? What has become of that?

Sir Henry Cole was one of the shrewdest and the bravest of the band of Helpers whom the Prince Consort gathered round him in carrying out the great scheme of the Exhibition of 1851. At the last moment, prior to the opening, he was called on to put the Exhibition of 1862 in proper trim. He was the guiding spirit of the British Commission at the Paris Exposition of 1867; it may be said that he was practically the founder of the South Kensington Museum; he was undoubtedly the Father of the National School of Cookery; and long after his retirement, on a well-earned pension, from the public service, he continued to occupy himself, with his old energy and concentrative power, with enterprises of a social and philanthropic nature. I have not enumerated a twentieth part of the work which he did, simply because I lack the space to do so; but I may just remark that the very last time I met him—at one of the Grosvenor Sunday afternoons—he told me that he was organising a new house-to-house sanitary movement, and that his hope was to set up in every parish in the kingdom a "Pulpit of Health," next to that of the clergyman.

Of course, during a career so long and so busy, he trod on innumerable toes, and made many enemies. He was incessantly abused and ridiculed as a quack, a pretender, and a humbug, and from these points of view was quite a standing dish with the Saturday Review. Now, everybody is sorry that he is dead, and reveres his memory as that of an enlightened, courageous, and virtuous citizen, who in his time did yeoman's service to the State.

There was buried the other day a highly-respected artist, of whom it may without impropriety be said, I suppose, that he was the Patriarch of English scene-painters. This was Mr. Thomas Grieve, a member of a family whose renown as scenic decorators takes us back to far beyond the days before Beverly, and right into the days of Clarkson Stanfield and David Roberts, both famous scene-painters, and both Royal Academicians. Stanfield, who has been dead fifteen years, would, were he alive, be only eighty-eight now. Roberts, who joined the majority eighteen years since, would only be eighty-six; while Mr. Thomas Grieve, over whom the grave has just closed, was on the verge of eighty-three. He was old enough to have remembered as managers of the two "patent" houses John Kemble, Charles Kemble, Elliston, Laporte (afterwards impresario of the King's, now Her Majesty's, Theatre), Captain Polhill, Alfred Bunn, William Charles Macready, Madame Vestris, and Charles Mathews. He was old enough to have painted, in conjunction with his distinguished brother William, the scenery for Byron's "Marino Faliero" and "Werner," on their first production; and I know that, nearly forty years ago, the "Grieves" painted the scenery for a pantomime, of which the "opening" was founded on the story of King John and his Barons at Runnymede, and which, from the fact of most of the earliest contributors to Punch having a hand in it, was popularly known as "Punch's Pantomime."

All that I can remember of this doubtless droll production is that in one of the scenes there was a posse of "supers," supposed to represent the mailed Barons who forced their Sovereign to accept the celebrated "little" bill called Magna Charta, and each of whom bore on his breast a letter of the alphabet, very conspicuously displayed. At first, these gentlemen of letters were promiscuously intermingled; but, at a given signal, they ranged themselves in a line right across the stage, and the inscription on their breasts in its ensemble was made to read thus:—

W.E.'LL. M.A.K.E. J.O.H.N. S.H.I.V.E.R. I.N. H.I.S. S.H.O.E.S. I.F. H.E. D.O.N.T. M.I.N.D. H.I.S. P.S. A.N.D. Q.'S.

Modern seekers after amusement will perhaps preserve a keener remembrance of Mr. Thomas Grieve in connection with the Gallery of Illustration in Regent-street (next to where is now the Raleigh Club), and where he, with the late Mr. William Telbin as his co-labourer, produced the beautiful dia-panorama of "the Overland Route;" yet do I find from Weale's "London Exhibited" that "the Overland Route" was in full swing so far back as 1852. Truly, time slips away with terrible swiftness.

The remembrance of the very capable artist and excellent gentleman, whose demise I record (I knew him very well, and curiously enough, at long years' intervals, two of the only four dramatic productions that I ever ventured upon were illustrated by his practised pencil), sent me to Horace Walpole's "Anecdotes of Painting," with a view of finding something relating to the scenic art during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It would seem that for that art the Honourable Horace Waddlepoodle (as Mr. Thackeray was irreverent enough to call the Lord of Strawberry Hill) entertained as profound a contempt as my Lord Sherbrooke entertains for journalism.

To Inigo Jones, who is justly regarded as the father of English scene painting, the practice of which he probably studied at Venice, the Hon. Horace is civil enough. He says of Aggas (the son of the surveyor who engraved the map of London published in the reign of Queen Elizabeth), "he was little more than a scene-painter, for which reason I do not give him a separate article here" (in the "Anecdotes"); and of Thomas Stevenson, a pupil of Aggas, Walpole sneeringly remarks, "he painted landscapes in oil, figures and landscapes in distemper. The latter is only a dignified expression used for scene-painting."

And yet the noble anecdotist enumerates a goodly number of capable artists who were also scene-painters. John Freeman, the historical artist and rival of Fuller in the reign of Charles II., "was employed in painting scenes for the theatre in Covent-garden" (for which read Drury-lane). Streater, whom the Merry Monarch at the Restoration appointed his serjeant painter, and who embellished the theatre and the chapel of All-Souls' at Oxford, "painted all the scenes at the old play-house." This versatile and industrious artist was unfortunate in one of his panegyrists, who wrote—

Thus future ages must confess they owe
To Streater more than Michael Angelo!

John Laguerre, the friend of Hogarth, and son of one of the artists immortalised in Pope's spiteful line—was an excellent scene-painter. Francis Hayman, who, with Hogarth, helped to decorate Vauxhall Gardens; Samuel Scott, the English Cunaletto; Amiconi, who painted the proscenium at Covent Garden; and George Lambert, were all "mere scene-painters."

Where sprawl the Saints of Verrio and Laguerre—

Mem.: Although Lely and Kneller were content to receive twenty pounds for a half-length life-sized portrait; and Sir James Thornhill was only paid forty shillings per square yard for painting the cupola of St. Paul's, and twenty-five shillings a yard for beautifying the hall at Blenheim, the artists of the Georgian era enjoyed occasional slices of luck. What do you think of the good fortune of John Ellis, one of Sir James's pupils, who, through the interest of Sir Robert Walpole, was appointed master-keeper of the lions in the Tower? "In these easy circumstances," writes the Hon. H. W., "he was not very assiduous in his profession." Lucky John Ellis! I envy him. Ah! if in one's declining days one could only hope for the "easy circumstances" of a permanent appointment. There are no lions left in the Tower; but I don't think that I should mind being beef-eater to a travelling menagerie, or cicerone to the Chamber of Horrors at Madame Tussaud's.

The working of some coal-mines in China has, it is announced, been brought to a stand-still by superior authority; an astrologer or some other mandarin person at Peking having discovered that the operations of the miners were of a nature to disturb the Earth Dragon who lives "down below Nathaniel" (what is the meaning of "down below Nathaniel"?), and who, if interfered with, might on his part disturb the maues of the Empress mother, raise the price of dried ducks, flowery pekoe, and edible birds'-nests, and, in fine, do all sorts of uncomfortable things. Now it is all very well to laugh at the Celestials for their grotesque superstition; still I cannot help regarding the Earth Dragon as a creature to be spoken of with some degree of respect. Milton is scrupulously polite to the E. D.

The Old Dragon underground
In straiter limits bound,
Not half so far casts his thurped sway;
And, wroth to see his kingdom fail,
Swindles the scaly horror of his folded tail.

A highly Conservative people like the Chinese are bound to believe in and to respect the susceptibilities of the "Old Dragon underground." Are you quite sure that there is no one under the sea as well? The great and good people who, in the Nineteenth Century, have signed the Protest against the Channel Tunnel seem desperately afraid of somebody or something "swindling the scaly horror of his folded tail" between Dover and Calais some day.

The discussion at the Society of Arts of Sir Edward Watkin's paper on the feasibility of the Tunnel scheme has been brought to a close. All kinds of conflicting opinions were, of course, expressed; but, in the end, the meeting agreed by a large majority that the experiments now being made should be persevered in. As Sir Edward Watkin put it, "whether the objections raised from a military point of view were sound or not, the making of the tunnel was purely a question of the advance of civilisation." There it is. But we have no forecasting pedometer of the "advance of civilisation." Sometimes its advances are by "leaps and bounds," but very often its rate of locomotion does not equal that of a tortoise crawling down (say) Sloane-street, Knightsbridge. Were I not old enough to remember that all weapons of war were excluded from the Great Exhibition in 1851, and that a colossal Krupp's gun was one of the leading attractions in the Paris Exposition of 1857, and that since the last-named period wars and rumours of wars have been almost incessant, I should be ready enough to believe in the surcease of the thousand years of war, and the imminence of the thousand years of peace.

A gentleman has written a righteously indignant letter to the Standard stating that on going down to Windsor to visit a relative who is a private in the 2nd Life Guards, and ordering dinner for himself and gallant friend at one of the best-known hotels in the Royal borough, the manager positively refused to allow him and his companion to dine in the public coffee-room, but condescendingly offered to permit him to take a private room if he paid extra for it. This the indignant Amphitryon refused to do, and repaired to another hotel at which the landlord had no objection to the uniform of a private (and a very handsome one it is) in her Majesty's Household Cavalry. At the unprejudiced hotel they found a good dinner and every civility and attention.

Hotel-keepers and managers know their own business best, and, if they wish to earn a livelihood, are bound to consult the whims and foibles of their regular customers, who might, perchance, object to dining at the next table to a private soldier. But the grievance complained of is a very old one. I remember cases of soldiers in uniform being denied admission to the dress circle of a theatre, and of their not being allowed to take cabin passages on board steamers. I suppose that a railway clerk could not legally refuse to issue a first-class ticket to Private Thomas Atkins; but it is to be feared that more than one London manager would strongly object to one of his stalls being occupied even by a non-commissioned officer in the Guards. It is not wholly our fault if we are the most snobbish people in the world. Our education, our customs, our traditions all tend to make us snobs; and there is even a substratum of snobbery in many of the institutions of which we are most justly proud.

In the case of the prejudiced hotel at Windsor, the manager, however, displayed a ludicrous want of perception of the fitness of things. The privates of the Household Cavalry are all, by prescriptive courtesy, gentlemen. Formerly, I believe, their commanding officer addressed them on parade as "Gentlemen of the Life Guard;" but, although that custom may have been abrogated, it is generally understood that a Life Guardsman ranks higher in the social scale (bether the social scale!) than the ordinary "common soldier."

Here is a morsel of Pacific-slope Americanese, which requires a slight gloss to render it comprehensible to the English reader. I cull it from the always vivacious San Francisco News Letter. "He is dependent for stylish clothes and choice cigars upon a bounty to be begged for with as much pertinacity and grovelling as are exhibited by the beat who strikes you for a quarter on the street corner." A "beat" is a beggar; to "strike" is to importune; and a "quarter" is twenty-five cents, or a quarter of a dollar. But is there not something redolent of the affluence of the Golden State in the idea of a mendicant who asks not for a penny, but for a shilling? One is reminded of the old Lincoln's Inn Fields beggar that John Thomas Smith, the engraver (Nolleken's friend, and disappointed legatee), was aware of, and who was wont to demand roast veal "with a voice like the sound of a trumpet."

Here, from the same source, is a good "nigger" story:—

An aged negro in Austin, Texas, known as Uncle Mose, prosecuted a vagabond for stealing his chickens. The old man made out a clear case, describing his chickens as a peculiar Spanish breed, of which he was sole owner in that section. The defendant's lawyer, on getting up to cross-examine the old man, sternly said: "Uncle Mose, you claim nobody else has any of these chickens but you. Now, what would you say if I were to tell you that I have half a dozen of them in my back yard at this very time?" "Well, boss," responded Uncle Mose, "I should say dat dat ar' tef had paid you yer fee with my chickens." That ended the cross-examination.

Mr. E. Edwards (Birmingham) writes me that he does make mention, at p. 239 of his "Words, Facts, and Phrases" (not "Theories," as the printers made me say recently) of the ambiguous expression, "God save the mark." I must have overlooked the reference, as also one in Dyce's Shakespeare to which my attention has been called by "W. P." But I am still very much in the dark as to what "God save the mark" really means. "P. II." (Morden College, Blackheath) writes that he finds in an old school note-book of his the following mem. on the occurrence of Lancelot Gobbo's ejaculation, "Salvum sit quod tango:"—Petronius. When a person was ill or unlucky he touched the part affected and said, "Save the mark." This explanation was given by "P. H.'s" form-master, himself no mean antiquary and etymologist; but what authority the Dominie had for his explanation "P. H." is unable to say.

Mem.: Was not Charlemagne accustomed to "make his mark" with one finger of his glove dipped in ink? G. A. S.

THE ROYAL WEDDING.

The Portraits of their newly-married Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Albany, whose happy wedding took place on Thursday last in St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, in the presence of her Majesty the Queen and of all the Royal family, and of the bride's parents, the Prince and Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont, are presented to our readers in the Extra Supplement to this week's Number of our Journal. Some illustrations of the Marriage will appear in our ordinary publication of next Saturday; besides which, on Tuesday next, we shall issue a Special Extra Double Number, of two whole sheets, containing Memoirs of Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, and of Princess Helen of Waldeck, now Duchess of Albany; a full account of the Wedding at Windsor, of the attendant ceremonies and festivities, and of the bridal dresses and marriage gifts; of the bride's parental home in Germany, and the present abode of their Royal Highnesses at Claremont, with abundance of illustrations of those interesting subjects.

His Royal Highness Leopold George Duncan Albert, Prince of Great Britain and Ireland, Duke of Saxony, Prince of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, Duke of Albany, Earl of Clarence, and Baron Arklow, Knight of the Garter, Knight of the Thistle, Knight Grand Cross of the Star of India, and Knight Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George, is the fourth and youngest son, but the sixth child, of her Majesty Queen Victoria and of the late Prince Consort. He is twenty-nine years of age, having been born, at Buckingham Palace, on April 7, 1853. He was educated by several private tutors until 1872, when he became a student of Christ Church College, Oxford, under the charge of Mr. Robert Hawthorn Collins, M.A., C.B., now Comptroller to the Household of his Royal Highness. The Prince quitted his residence at the University in 1876, and made a tour in Italy, after which he lived some time at Boyton Manor, in Wiltshire; travelled again, in 1878, in Italy and Germany, visiting also the Paris Exhibition; in 1879 took up his residence at Claremont, Esher; in the next year went to America on a visit to his sister, Princess Louise, and her husband, the Marquis of Lorne, Governor-General of Canada; and last year, while in Germany, visiting his brother-in-law, the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt, met his future bride, with her mother, the Princess of Waldeck, and soon afterwards was betrothed to that young lady, to whom his Royal Highness is now so happily married. The Duke of Albany inherits from his lamented father, and has improved by assiduous culture, those refined mental tastes and talents which make an accomplished patron of all the liberal arts and sciences; while his thoughtful concern for popular and for technical education, and for all sound plans of social utility and beneficence, has been shown by his public addresses on many occasions during the last three years, which are scarcely inferior to those of the late Prince Consort. In the presidency and advocacy of such undertakings, as they will continue to arise, and in the exercise of his rightful influence as a Prince of the Royal Family, a Peer of Parliament, and one of the leaders of high English society, we may expect of the Duke of Albany increasing public usefulness, and we feel the more disposed to rejoice in his prospect of domestic happiness.

The Duchess of Albany, Princess Helen Frederica Augusta of Waldeck-Pyrmont, is eight years younger than her husband, as she was born on Feb. 17, 1861. She is the fourth daughter, now living, of George Victor, Sovereign Prince of Waldeck-Pyrmont, and of his consort, Princess Helen Wilhelmina Henrietta, who is a daughter of the late Duke William of Nassau. The Principality of Waldeck-Pyrmont is of small extent, with a population of 54,000 and a revenue of £78,000, but of high antiquity from the times of feudalism, though now under direct Prussian administration, and a component part of the German Empire. Waldeck, the larger portion of the Prince's territory, with a romantic old castle, surrounded by hills and forests, is situated to the north of Hesse-Cassel, bordering on Nassau and Westphalia; the residence of the Prince is at Arolsen, on the little river Aar, which flows into the Weser. The smaller Pyrmont territory, detached in situation, is thirty miles farther north, towards Hanover, and adjacent to those of Brunswick and Lippe-Detmold. Pyrmont, on the banks of the Emmer, is a favourite spa, and its chalybeate and carbonate waters have some medicinal repute. A sister of Princess Helen is Emma, Queen of the Netherlands; she has one brother, six years younger than herself.

Our Portrait of the Duke of Albany is from a photograph by Messrs. Molsberger and Christmann, of Arolsen; and that of the Duchess of Albany, from one by Mr. J. Thomson, of 78, Buckingham Palace-road, photographer to the Queen.

The arrival of the Royal bride in England, on Tuesday last, was hailed with much gratification both at Queenborough, near Sheerness, where she landed, and at Windsor, where she was received, with her parents, by the Queen, the Duke of Albany, and his brothers and sisters. The Prince and Princess of Waldeck, with their children, Princess Helen, the young Prince Frederick, and the little Princess Elizabeth, came across from Flushing to Queenborough in the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, arriving before eight o'clock in the morning. Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, on behalf of the Queen, attended by General Du Plat, one of the Queen's Equerries, went down to Queenborough to meet these distinguished guests. At ten o'clock Prince Christian went on board the Victoria and Albert, and the pier began to fill with spectators. Among those near the gangway were Major-General Sir Evelyn Wood; Vice-Admiral Sir Reginald Macdonald, commanding at the Nore; Colonel E. J. Connolly, commanding the Royal Marines at Chatham; Colonel Stuart, commanding the Royal Engineers at Chatham; and a number of naval and military officers. As the hour for the disembarkation of the Royal party approached, the Mayor and Corporation of Queenborough appeared in their robes of office, accompanied by the town sergeants. As the air rang with the National Anthem, and the guns of the war-ships thundered a welcome, the Royal party were seen grouped on the deck of the yacht. When Princess Helen reached the pier, escorted by Prince Christian, Miss Filmer, the daughter of the Mayor of Queenborough, presented a bouquet to her Serene Highness. The Town Clerk read the address of welcome.

Princess Helen personally expressed her thanks to the Mayor and Corporation. She said: "I am much obliged, Mr. Mayor and gentlemen, for the kind reception you have given me on coming to my English home. I can assure you that I very much appreciate your good wishes. You have my hearty thanks." The Princess spoke these few words in a most graceful manner, very distinctly, and with a German accent by no means strongly marked. Prince Christian also said a few words of acknowledgment on behalf of Prince Leopold, and shook the Mayor heartily by the hand. The Princess wore a costume of peacock blue silk, spotted with strawberries, over which was a dolman of similar colour, without spots, but handsomely trimmed with lace and ruching, and rosepink ribbons. Her dark brown hair was partly covered by a black velvet bonnet, trimmed with pink roses of the same shade as the ribbons of the dolman, and golden strawberries. Her Serene Highness was greeted with loud cheers as she stood at the door of the saloon carriage in full view of the spectators, and seemed highly gratified by her reception.

There was hearty acclamation as the train rolled away from the pier towards London, and, quickly getting up speed, made the journey with excellent punctuality. At Clapham Junction a slight halt was made, and the Royal train was transferred from the care of Mr. Harris and Mr. Cockburn, of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, to that of Mr. Verrinder, of the London and South-Western line. By this time, five minutes to one o'clock, the rain, which had kept off during the morning, poured down in earnest, when Windsor Castle came in sight. But the train presently rolled into the Datchet-road Station, where the Duke of Albany and his brother the Duke of Connaught, and the Grand Duke of Hesse, were waiting to receive Princess Helen and her family. Princess Christian, Princess Louise, and Princess Beatrice had also come from the Castle to welcome their new sister. The Princesses were all attired in the Windsor uniform, Prince Leopold wearing the collar of the Waldeck Order, as well as the Star and Ribbon of the Garter. As the bride-elect alighted, the bridegroom received her with a kiss, and great were the greetings and caresses lavished upon her by the English Princesses. The Mayor and Corporation of Windsor were present.

When the carriages reached the Castle, at the grand entrance in the quadrangle, the Queen was seen, in the midst of a grove of flowers and shrubs, waiting to welcome her future daughter. The Queen was accompanied by her grandchild, Princess Victoria of Hesse, and, warm greetings having been exchanged, the Royal party proceeded to luncheon. This meal being concluded, all present, except the Queen herself, paid a visit to the White Drawing-Room, where the wedding presents which had been received and unpacked were laid out—a magnificent show, of which more is to be said next week.

The time at which it is needful that this sheet should go to press forbids our giving here a detailed report of the actual Marriage Ceremony on Thursday last; but the following is a correct statement of the arrangements which had received the approval of the Queen:—

Invitations had been sent by the Lord Chamberlain to the Ambassadors, Cabinet Ministers, and the various officers of State. A limited number of private invitations had also been issued. The parents of the bridesmaids were invited. All these guests travelled to Windsor by special train from Paddington, and on arrival were conveyed in the Queen's carriages direct to St. George's Chapel, to be in their places by half-past eleven.

At a quarter to twelve the Queen of the Netherlands, the Princesses of Wales and her daughters, the Princesses of Waldeck, the Crown Prince of Denmark, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, and the other Royal guests at the Castle started from the grand entrance. On arriving at the great doors of St. George's, they were joined by the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh and the Maharanee, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Prince Leiningen, Count Gleichen, and other distinguished personages. A procession was formed, and while it passed up the nave and the company were conducted to their places, Sir George Elvey played a new march of his own composition on the organ.

The Queen quitted the Castle at noon. The procession consisted of three carriages, her Majesty being accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Princess Victoria of Hesse. In the procession of the Sovereign the whole of the great officers of the Household walked. Her Majesty was attended by the Duchess of Bedford, Mistress of the Robes, by the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, Lady-in-Waiting, and by several other ladies. Mr. Erskine of Cardross bore the train, assisted by two pages of honour. During the progress of this procession Handel's "Occasional Overture" was played.

At a quarter past twelve the bridegroom's procession of four carriages quitted the Castle. Prince Leopold was accompanied by the Prince of Wales and by the Grand Duke of Hesse, who were his supporters during the ceremony. During this procession Mendelssohn's march from "Athalie" was played.

The bride's procession of four carriages left the Castle five minutes after that of the bridegroom; the Princess being accompanied by her father, the Prince of Waldeck-Pyrmont, and her brother-in-law, the King of the Netherlands. On arriving at the chapel the bridesmaids joined her, the new march composed by Gounod, by command of the Queen, expressly for the occasion, being played as the procession passed up to the altar.

The clergy assembled in the library of the Deanery at half-past eleven, and walked through the cloister in procession, taking up their position within the altar rails just before the arrival of the Queen; the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Worcester, and Oxford, the Dean of Windsor, Canons Lord W. Russell, Anson, and Courtenay; and the Minor Canons of St. George's being present. The Archbishop performed the ceremony. At the conclusion, the "Hallelujah Chorus" from Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" was sung by the choir of the Chapel, stationed in the organ-loft.

A combined procession was then formed, headed by the bride and bridegroom, followed by the Queen and the other personages in the order of their precedence, Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" being played.

On returning to the Castle the Duke and Duchess of Albany, the Queen, and the principal Royal visitors proceeded to the Green Drawing-room, where the register was signed, after which a déjeuner was served in the large dining-room adjoining. The general company took lunch in the Waterloo Chamber, lined all round with buffets. The Queen walked through the room, in order that she might exchange greetings with her friends; and before the party broke up Earl Sydney, the Lord Steward, proposed the toasts, "The Queen" and "The Bride and Bridegroom."

About half-past three the Duke and Duchess of Albany left the Castle for Claremont in a carriage and four. They started from the Queen's entrance, and drove straight into the Long Walk, whence they proceeded by the high road. The procession was escorted by a detachment of the 2nd Life Guards as far as Chertsey. At Esher Lady Brett presented the Duchess with a bouquet on behalf of the inhabitants. The Hon. Mrs. Breton and the Hon. A. Yorke accompanied them in attendance.

In the evening the Queen gave a state banquet in St. George's Hall.

POLO IN INDIA.

This admirable game and equestrian exercise, which has of late years been taken up with much zeal and success by the officers of many regiments at home, especially of the Cavalry and Royal Artillery, was imported from India, where it had long been practised at most of the British military stations. It may not improbably have been suggested originally by the frequent exhibitions of the spear and of the sabre on horseback, to which the native cavalry of Asiatic countries, like the Arabs of the Levant, have been addicted from time immemorial. But the English adaptation of it is really a game of "hockey," played with long-handled mallets, by men riding on smart and well-trained ponies, which turn and wind after the flying ball with amazing nimbleness; the endeavour of the players, divided into opposite sides, being to drive the ball through the flagged stakes or "pegs," that mark the goal defended by the adverse party. Eight horsemen on each side suffice to make a lively field, the space in which they contend being perhaps two hundred yards in length, and one hundred in width, of level turf clear of every obstacle, and good smooth galloping ground. We are indebted to Lieutenant Francis Carter, of the 5th Fusiliers, stationed at Agra, for the spirited sketches of "Polo in India," which appear in this Number of our Journal.

THE TRIAL OF RODERICK MACLEAN.

The miserable young man who shot at the Queen, and narrowly missed killing either her Majesty or Princess Beatrice, at the Windsor Railway Station, on Thursday, March 2, has been tried in the Berks Assize Court at Reading, and has been found Not Guilty, on the ground of insanity. The trial, which took place before Lord Chief Justice Coleridge and Baron Huddleston, under a Special Commission, on Wednesday last week, began at half-past ten, and was finished at half-past five. There was a great crowd of spectators in the galleries and on the floor below, with a large number of ladies, many of whom carried or wore bouquets of primroses in memory of the late Lord Beaconsfield, that day being the anniversary of his death. The prisoner made a wretched figure in the dock, looking feeble, worn, and unhealthy, and dressed in a dingy grey overcoat.

The counsel for the prosecution were Sir Henry James (Attorney-General), Sir F. Herschell (Solicitor-General), Mr. Powell, Q.C., Mr. Poland, and Mr. A. L. Smyth. The prisoner was defended by Mr. Montagu Williams and Mr. Arthur Yates. The grand jury, of which Sir George Bowyer was foreman, was first addressed by the Lord Chief Justice in a charge, explaining the law of high treason under a statute of Edward III., with a long series of judicial decisions upon its meaning, and the statute 36 George III., chapter 7, relating to the crime of attempting to cause the death of the Sovereign, or to maim or wound or inflict bodily harm. The grand jury, in half an hour, returned a true bill, and the prisoner was then put on his trial for high treason, to which he pleaded not guilty.

The Attorney-General stated the facts of the case, and said that the condition of the prisoner's mind would have to be inquired into; and, if he should be found to be insane, every subject of her Majesty would feel satisfaction that it was not from among those who were sane that a hand had been raised against our beloved and honoured Queen. The witnesses called to relate the circumstances of the attempt to shoot her Majesty were Mr. Superintendent Hayes, of the Windsor police; Mr. R. Errington, of Sunderland, who saw the act; Mr. James Burnside, photographer, who wrested the revolver from Maclean's hand after he had fired; Francis Orchard, one of the Queen's servants; and Master Gordon Wilson, an Eton schoolboy, who was standing near the prisoner. Inspector Turner, of the railway engine service, proved finding the bullet which had been shot from the revolver, at a distance of thirty-three yards. Mr. J. G. Smyth, the station-master, deposed that prisoner was there before, waiting for the train from London. A gunsmith at Portsmouth, Mr. Sheriff Warrell, proved that Maclean bought the cartridges of him; and a pawnbroker's assistant, named Fuller, at Portsea, had sold him the revolver for 5s. 9d. This was the case for the prosecution.

The leading counsel for the defence, Mr. Montagu Williams, then addressed the jury, contending that the prisoner was of unsound mind, and was not responsible for his actions. The following witnesses gave evidence in support of this plea of insanity; Dr. Towers Smith, surgeon, of Kensington, who attended Maclean for a wound in the head, in 1866, but who could not say whether or not his brain was affected; Dr. Henry Maudsley, who examined him in 1874, at the request of his father, and considered him to be not of sound mind; Mr. Stanbury, an artist, who had known the family twenty years, and had since 1871 thought him quite insane; Dr. C. Hitchins, of Weston-super-Mare, who in June, 1880, gave a certificate for his confinement in the Bath and Somerset Lunatic Asylum; and Dr. Thomas Steel, assistant physician to that Lunatic Asylum, at Wells, where Maclean was confined during a twelvemonth; both these medical witnesses considered him to be labouring under homicidal mania. Letters written by the prisoner to his sister, in May, 1880, were also put in, showing that he suffered from insane delusions about people wearing blue on purpose to vex or ruin him, and that he felt a vague inclination to murder somebody. The Rev. A. MacLachlan, a clergyman in Hampshire, deposed that, a week or so before the attempt on the Queen's life, Maclean fainted at his garden gate, and seemed in a very lost condition. Dr. Edgar Sheppard, of the Colney Hatch Asylum, and Professor of Psychological Medicine at King's College, who had twice examined Maclean in prison; Dr. Orange, Superintendent of the Broadmoor Criminal Lunatic Asylum, and Dr. Oliver Maurice, surgeon to the Reading Jail, all gave evidence, and agreed that the prisoner was of unsound mind.

The Attorney-General did not contest this point in his brief reply, and when the Lord Chief Justice had summed up, the jury, in a few minutes, found the prisoner not guilty. It was ordered that he should be detained, for his own and others' safety, at the discretion of the Crown; and he is now consigned to the Criminal Lunatic Asylum, probably for the remainder of his life.

LACE AND LACE-MAKING.

There are, chiefly in and around Nottingham, lace factories of considerable magnitude, with endless rows of bobbin-frames and warp-frames driven by the mighty steam-engine, and tended by thousands of workpeople; besides finishing establishments, dressing, bleaching, and others, where fancy lace goods, plain net, and curtain pieces, are produced in large quantities for the home and foreign markets. A different kind of manufacture is that of the "pillow-lace," shown in one of our illustrations, as carried on both in East Devon, in the district between the river Axe and the river Exe, of which Honiton and Sidmouth are the immediate centres for this domestic industry; and in some rural districts nearer London, in the villages of Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Oxfordshire; also at Limerick, and at Donaghadee, on the north coast of Ireland. This work is mostly done by women, or by young girls and even children, in their cottages at home, usually sitting at the open door for the sake of the light; and they sell the lace to small dealers in the villages, who dispose of it wholesale to the travelling agents of merchants from the larger towns. The worker sits holding the pillow on her lap, with a paper fastened upon it, in which the pattern is traced and pricked out in pin-holes. She has a number of pairs of little sticks, about four inches long; each pair joined together by a thread which is partly wound round the ends of the sticks. She fixes pins upright in all the holes, and hangs the threads around these pins, after which she begins to interweave and cross the threads, by passing the little sticks over and under each other, as they hang down loose on the pillow. When all the holes of the pattern have been filled with pins, and all the threads have been intertwined, the fabric thus produced is a copy of the pattern, which may be a "Honiton sprig." Its parts are then knit together by taking up a stitch, with a threaded "needle pin," through one of the pin-holes, and thereby making a loop, through which one of the lace sticks is passed, and the thread on it knotted with one of the others. Honiton sprigs are joined together, afterwards, either on the pillow, by surrounding them with other lace-work, or by sewing them on to plain net lace with the needle. The wearers of lace, including Royal brides and bridesmaids at Royal weddings, of whom some of our fair readers will be thinking this week, must naturally feel some interest in this pretty manufacture, which employs the quick fingers of their hard-working sisters in many a rustic home.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

An original English dramatist of the Robertsonian type, or, indeed, any type at all, being for the present undiscoverable, the management of the Haymarket Theatre have sensibly availed themselves of the work of a gentleman who is undeniably the cleverest and the most popular of living French playwrights, and have secured the exclusive right of presenting in an English dress the famous play of "Odette," by M. Victorien Sardou. The name of the gentleman who has executed the English version has been (somewhat unjustly, I think) omitted from the Haymarket programme. The work which he has performed may not be of a very dignified order; but he has surely no reason to feel ashamed of it. He has succeeded in introducing numerous and agreeable variations on the air originally performed with such triumphant success at the Vaudeville Theatre, Paris. He has altered, with curious felicity, the nationality of some of his dramatis personæ. He has entirely eliminated from the fable the crowning catastrophe of the suicide of Odette; and to this ingenious but, unfortunately, anonymous gentleman finally belongs the credit of having clothed a hybrid drama in hybrid language. Mindful that in the play of "King Henry the Fifth" Shakespeare makes the prisoner of war, Monsieur Le Fez, and the attendant boy talk French, while Ancient Pistol talks English, the English versifier of "Odette," gleefully following so illustrious a precedent, has interlarded his dialogue with choice morsels of the Gallic tongue. Indeed, most of the characters appear to have been at a feast of languages, and to have stolen the scraps. Mrs. Bancroft, stimulated, perhaps, by the remembrance that the historic home of the Italian lyric drama in London is nearly opposite the Haymarket Theatre—Mantua is so very close to Verona—breaks forth in the Tuscan tongue; and I was only disappointed to find that, in the gambling-house scene, the young gentleman who, in a fez, and with a star on the breast of his surcoat, was presumably "made up" to represent the exemplary Ismail Pascha, did not favour the audience with a little Arabic. It might perhaps, as a "tag," have brought down the house as triumphantly as Madame Modjeska's "Lâche!" at the end of the first act, and her "Voleur!" at the end of the third, did; to say nothing of Mrs. Bancroft's inimitably vivacious "Fa caldo." Altogether, the smooth, flowing, and sometimes crisp and nervous dialogue in the Haymarket "Odette" may be taken as a new departure in writing for our stage. It has a truly international ring, and may prove, indirectly, a powerful factor in the resumption of negotiations for an Anglo-French treaty of commerce, and in reconciling the protesting signatories of the Nineteenth Century to the construction of the Channel Tunnel. Perhaps, after all, the English version of "Odette" may be a work of collaboration: a combined emanation of the genius of Mr. Puff, of the "Critic," Monsieur Fenwick de Porquet, and the ingenious gentleman who used to propound the French puzzles in the World—the polyglot spirit of Ollendorf breathing harmony and unity into the whole.

Oddly enough, the evening which witnessed the remarkably able and interesting production of "Odette" at the Haymarket, was that of the day on which began, in the Civil Court of the Seine, the trial of what is commonly known in Paris as the "Chaulnes Scandal." The case against the Duchesse de Chaulnes is her infidelity to her husband with a gentleman who used to remain for days concealed in the house. "On one occasion," I am quoting from a morning paper, "the Duke, being informed that there was a robber in the place, knocked at the door of his wife's apartment, and found the gentleman hiding therein. The Duchesse acknowledged her guilt, implored his pardon, and signed a full confession, also renouncing her claim to her children, whom, however, she subsequently attempted to steal from the custody of their grandmother, the Duchesse de Chevreuse." The "plot" of the "Chaulnes Scandal" bears in many respects a remarkable similarity to that of "Odette," but the fact varies from the fiction in the circumstances that the Duke de Chaulnes is dead, whereas in the Haymarket piece Lord Henry Trevene continues to live a prosperous gentleman, and he has only one child, a daughter, named Eva.

For the rest, the story of "Odette" may be very briefly narrated. Lord Henry, an English nobleman, and the life and soul of chivalrous honour, has married, against the advice of his prudent brother Arthur, a beautiful and giddy young foreigner, Odette. He loves her with passionate devotion; and, to all seeming, she returns his love. Of their union a child is born,—a girl, who, when the curtain rises on the drama, is three years of age. But the reprehensible Odette is enamoured of a Russian prince, named "Troubitzkoy"—it should properly be Troubitskoy;—she is domiciled in Paris, and one night, "after the opera is over," she entertains at tea two of her husband's English friends—Lord Henry is in England, and is not expected to return yet awhile—and the Prince Troubitskoy afore-said: him she apparently dismisses; but she has made the dissipated Muscovite understand that he is to come back to her house, by means of an escalier dérobé, later in the night, when the two Englishmen shall have taken their departure. Meanwhile, this culpable married woman goes to bed. Soon afterwards her husband, Lord Henry, thinking to give his wife a joyful surprise, turns up in a hurry by the tidal train, accompanied by his brother Arthur. He, however, is destined to be surprised in a very disagreeable manner; for a key is heard to turn in the lock of the door leading to the escalier dérobé, and the profligate Troubitskoy makes his appearance. He is forthwith collared by the indignant husband, and is morally kicked down stairs by Lord Henry's English friends, who propose to call on his friends on the morrow to settle the details of a duel. The stage is now darkened. The reprehensible Odette opens the doors of her chamber and clasps what she believes to be the form of her paramour; but which, a light being thrown on the subject, turns out to be that of her husband. Odette does not appear to be very sorry for what she has done. In fact, she tries to turn the tables on, and eventually defies, Lord Henry; but she is roused to a terrible pitch of exasperation when her wronged spouse orders her out of the house, and tells her that she shall never see her child again. The little one has, indeed, been already taken into custody by the discreet Lord Arthur Trevene. Hereupon, the defeated, foiled, and baffled Odette shrieks out to her husband that he is "un lâche," a coward; and the curtain falls upon what is really a very powerful and impressive situation. It would have been more impressive, however, had Lord Henry locked Odette up in a cupboard, and proceeded to kill Prince Troubitskoy;—the two English friends holding candles, and "seeing fair."

The next act is not a very strong one. Fifteen years have elapsed, and we are at Nice, at the gay season of the Carnival. Lord Henry Trevene has declined to divorce his wife, with the intention, as he rather selfishly puts it, of depriving her of the privilege of marrying again. The wretched woman has declined the handsome allowance offered her by her husband. She still retains his name; but for a long time has been wandering up and down the Continent under more or less disreputable circumstances. She is now at Nice, maintaining very equivocal relations with an American spiritualist, quack-salver, blackleg, and swindler, Dr. Broadway Wilkes. Once, during her troubled pilgrimage, she has made a fruitless attempt to abduct her daughter. All these details are told about Odette in Act the Second, in which the lady herself does not make her appearance. The personages whom we do see are her daughter Eva, now grown to be of marriageable age; her sweetheart, Lord Shandon, a young Irish nobleman; her doting, but sad and sorrowful papa, Lord Henry, and his two devoted English friends, Mr. John Stratford and Mr. Philip Eden, the last of whom has just married a young lady from Düsseldorf. Eva has been told that her mamma was drowned many years ago at Nice; but Lord Shandon's mother knows all about the Troubitskoy scandal, and makes it conditional on her granting permission to her son to marry Eva, that Lady Henry Trevene shall relinquish her espousal name, and enter into an agreement never to come to England, and never to molest her daughter. The third act is an extremely entertaining one; although its varied episodes do not help the action of the piece much: being chiefly devoted to an exposition of the humours of the cosmopolitan rascals of either sex who may always be found congregated in such a refugium peccatorum as Nice. A card-playing assembly in the apartments of Dr. Broadway Wilkes ends in the exposure of that scarcely fairly-selected type of Transatlantic character as a swindler and a cheat, and the invasion of his premises by the police. When Odette is shown the marked cards which her American guide, philosopher, and friend has used for gambling and swindling purposes, she resorts to the very old French theatrical "trick" of tearing up the cards and hurling the fragments at the scoundrel's head, screaming out "Voleur." This was a most effective "situation," but intensely melodramatic and touching was the subsequent interview between Lady Henry and her husband, who has come to Dr. Broadway Wilkes's rooms in order to propose to Odette the terms agreed upon between himself and Lady Shandon. Odette at first indignantly refuses what she conceives to be her maternal rights, and throughout assumes the attitude rather of the injured than of the guilty party; but at length a kind of compromise is arrived at between husband and wife, and Odette is to be allowed to have an interview with Eva, but in the presence of her father, and on the rigid condition that the mother is not to make herself known to her daughter. In Act the Fourth and last, the promised interview—preceded by some slightly too comic love-making between Lord Shandon and Eva—takes place. It is, from first to last, deeply pathetic. Odette is introduced to Eva as an intimate friend of her departed mother. The poor desolate woman religiously keeps her promise not to reveal her identity to her child; but the struggle within her is awful to witness, and might have melted a softer heart than that of Lord Henry Trevene, whose character throughout the piece appears to be marked by more egoism and more vindictiveness than should be expected from a high-minded English gentleman. Ultimately, Odette, convulsed by emotion, after passionately embracing her daughter, wanders away into the enight—in the French play, I believe, she drowns herself—and Lord Shandon, it is to be presumed, marries Eva Trevene.

I intend to return to "Odette" next week; for, with the limited space at my command, it is manifestly impossible for me to do even moderate justice to the truly admirable acting of Madame Modjeska as Odette, of Mr. Bancroft as Lord Henry Trevene, of Mr. Arthur Cecil as John Stratford, of Mr. H. B. Conway as Philip Eden, of Mr. C. Brookfield as the Figaro-like major-domo Narcisse; and of Mrs. Bancroft as the scheming widow, Lady Walker; and of the charming Miss Meador as Philip Eden's loving and unsophisticated little wife. Nor shall the merits of Mr. Pincro as the cockney tradesman, Mr. Hunway, and of Miss Wade as his wife; of Mr. Smedley as Prince Troubitskoy, and Miss C. Grahame as Eva Trevene, of Mr. Owen Dove as Dr. Broadway Wilkes, and Mr. Stewart Dawson as François be forgotten. "Odette" was magnificently placed on the stage, and appeared to give the liveliest satisfaction to a crowded and distinguished audience.

G. A. S.

Sir Edward Watkin, M.P., has been chosen a member of the Dover Harbour Board, in the place of the Hon. Mr. Byng, as the representative of the South-Eastern Railway.

The Staines and West Drayton Railway will form part of a through north and south connection, bringing together the whole of the railway systems on the north with those on the south of the metropolis, saving the journey through London both for passengers and goods from the north going south, and vice versa. The construction of the Uxbridge and Rickmansworth section being simultaneously undertaken with this will, by running over a small section of the Great Western system, bring the London and North-Western, the Great Western, and London and South-Western into direct communication with each other. This must prove a great advantage to the general public, and the trade of the district will therefore be benefited by the saving effected in mileage, and consequent reduction in the cost of carriage for all kinds of freight, manures, &c. The prospective advantages may be considered to be a connection with the Midland and Great Northern Railways. To the latter company it will, no doubt, prove an immense advantage; indeed, we believe this company and the South-Eastern and London and Brighton Railways on the south will not be slow to avail themselves of the facilities which will eventually be afforded for an exchange of traffic between the various systems so to be connected, and which will tend materially to relieve the inconvenience and danger arising from the congested condition of the main lines of railway in the neighbourhood of London. The fact that Alderman Cotton, M.P. (the senior member for the City of London), is the chairman of this company, is a guarantee sufficient in itself that the project will be carried to completion, and that with the assistance of his co-directors, apparently all men of good business capacity, the interests of the shareholders will be well looked after during the independent existence of the company, as well as upon its transfer or amalgamation with one or other of the great companies, a matter which the directors, in all probability, will sooner or later have to discuss.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, April 25.

At the risk of being accused of rabâchage, of thrumming on the same string, of serving up week after week the Juvenalian crème répétée that is responsible for the death of the poor schoolmasters—whose place in this particular case is taken by the readers of this Journal—I must once more devote a few lines to the great name of Honoré de Balzac. Yesterday I spent two hours in turning over his books and manuscripts, which were on view at the Hôtel Drouot, Salle No. 6, and which to-day and to-morrow will be knocked down to the highest bidders. Balzac was a greedy reader; he loved books, and he had formed an excellent library, which he intended at one time to bequeath to his native town, an idea which the indifference of his compatriots caused him subsequently to abandon. All his books were bound in red calf or morocco, and the predominance of that colour in the bindings of the books to be sold to-day shows that the vast majority were actually Balzac's books, although they are announced as "forming the library of Madame Veuve Honoré de Balzac."

But the most interesting items in the sale are eleven manuscripts and a quantity of volumes of corrected proofs, most of them presented by Balzac to his future wife, Madame de Hanska. The difficulty of execution which Balzac had to overcome in writing his works has become one of the stock themes of the historians of the curiosities of literature. The aspect of his manuscripts and proofs surpasses any idea that description could give. The manuscripts vary much, but most of them are full of erasures. On the first page of the manuscript of "César Birotteau" Balzac has drawn the type of the illustrious perfumer. The manuscript of the "Contes Drôlatiques" is full of sketches; on a blank page Balzac betrays jokingly his troubles, and figures up by thousands of francs his Comptes Melancoliques. The titlepages and often the margins of the manuscripts of the "Recherche de l'Absolu" and of "Eugénie Grandet" are covered with calculations of all kinds; in which we discern fragments like this: "total for June, 7505; July, 1500; floating debt, 3700; deficit, 1705, etc." Always those terrible debts which have tracked even his widow to the grave! As for the proofs, the reader knows how the first proof was transformed by the addition of an incalculable number of intercalations, prolongations, branchings out, scraps of paper of all shapes and sizes stuck with wafers on to the margin—an inextricable maze, a Chinese puzzle, forming one of those famous scrolls and scrawls of cabalistic appearance which the compositors used to pass round, each one refusing to work for more than one hour at a time on Balzac's copy. And Balzac continued correcting and amplifying even to the tenth proof!

This afternoon the books sold at very fair prices. For the benefit of the bibliophiles I noted the highest prices fetched by the manuscripts. The manuscript of the two first dixains of the "Contes Drôlatiques," 1440f.; "Histoire des Treize," MS., 650f.; "Eugénie Grandet," MS., 2000f.; "César Birotteau," MS. and six vols. of corrected proofs, 1520f.; "Le Lys dans la Vallée," MS. and five vols. of corrected proofs, 1500f.; "Le Médecin de Campagne," MS. and proofs, eight vols., 1620f.; "Illusions perdues," MS. and proofs, five vols., 2050f.; "Béatrix," MS., 820f.; "Seraphita," MS. and proofs, 720f.; "La Recherche de l'Absolu," MS., 860f. A copy of the "Contes Drôlatiques," on Chinese paper, with Gustave Doré's illustrations, sold for 1460f.

A woman of distinction and of distinguished lineage, the Countess Louise d'Haussonville, died last week, at the age of sixty-four. Madame d'Haussonville was the daughter of the Duke Victor and the sister of the Duke Albert de Broglie, and consequently granddaughter of Madame de Staël, whose daughter married the Duke Victor de Broglie. Madame d'Haussonville was an authoress of considerable talent. She wrote under the pseudonym of "the author of 'Robert Emmett,'" the title of her first novel. Wife, daughter, and sister of Academicians, Madame d'Haussonville presided over a salon which was decidedly the most intellectual of the salons of the Faubourg St. Germain. She was a woman of talent, of tact, and of esprit, who knew how to continue the traditions of the literary salons of the last century. Her remains have been conveyed to Coppet, where they will be interred in the vault of the Necker-Staël family.

In 1843 Victor Hugo's trilogy "Les Burgraves" was played at the Comédie Française, and soundly hissed. On that occasion the poet, unwilling to admit that his genius had been subjected to the insult in question, discovered a sublime periphrasis, and remarked in a nonchalant tone, in the presence of the actors, "Il paraît qu'on trouble ma pièce!" However, the failure of the "Burgraves" caused Victor Hugo to take the formal resolution not to expose himself to hisses in future, and so he has kept in his portfolio half a dozen dramas, the titles of which alone are known to fame—"Torquemada," "le Grand'mère," "Peut-être, Frère de Gavroche," &c. It appears that the manuscript of "Torquemada" is now in the hands of the printer, and that the piece will be published next month. Then the question presents itself, "Torquemada" being no longer inédit and the author being able to stand by the printed text, will not Victor Hugo allow the piece to be played? Will he not, at the same time, be able to abide by his resolution of 1843, and to authorise the representation of his drama? The acolytes of the idol of the Avenue d'Eylau are busy discussing this delicate point of literary casuistry; and some, favoured with the confidence of the poet, venture to predict that "Torquemada" will be played at the Odéon next season.

Après of the Odéon, the centenary of the foundation of that theatre was celebrated quietly last night by a performance of the "Mariage de Figaro." The Odéon was really opened on April 9, 1782, so that the centenary was not celebrated exactly up to date; but when a theatre is in its hundred and first year, a fortnight more or less does not make much difference. For that matter, the ceremony was without éclat. It may interest the curious in matters theatrical to know that MM. Porel and Mouval have recently published the second volume of their anecdotic history of the Odéon, in which they have faithfully and minutely narrated the almost uninterrupted career of misfortune which the second Théâtre Français had experienced since its foundation.

When the Chamber resumes its labours it will probably commence with a course of theology. No less than seven bills against clericalism are on the order of the day—namely, M. Paul Bert's bills against the exercise of the Catholic faith in France and the suppression of the theological faculties; M. Waldeck-Rousseau's bill on associations; M. Jules Roche's bill relating to the secularisation of the property of the religious congregations, seminaries, consistories, &c., and to the separation of the Church and the State; M. Corentin Guyho's bills relating to the limitation of the power of the Bishops; and the Boysset bill for the abrogation of the Concordat.

M. Louis Blanc is again seriously ill, and obliged to keep his bed.

EDWARD DUNCAN.

By the death of this artist, on the 11th inst., at his residence, Park-road, Haverstock-hill, the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colours has lost one of its oldest and most valued members. Mr. Duncan was born in London in 1803, and showed a love of drawing at a very early age. His parents artied him to Robert Havell, the aquatinter, though he had already a predilection for painting. During his pupilage he had frequent opportunities of studying and occasionally of copying fine water-colour drawings by William Havell, and he at length determined to abandon engraving for painting. At an early period of his career he joined the new Society of Painters in Water-Colours, but subsequently withdrew. In 1848 he was elected an Associate of the "Old," now Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, and a full member the following year. His popularity thenceforth grew rapidly, and his works eventually were in wide request. His more important drawings were chiefly marine subjects, but he also painted many large landscapes—frequently with sheep. We have space only to name a few of his very numerous productions, such as "The Wreck," "The Life-boat," "Fishing-boats making for the Harbour of Boulogne—early morning," "Blue Lights," "Oyster Dredgers—Swansea Bay," and "Landing Fish on the Sands at Whitby." Mr. Duncan preserved the early traditions of our school of water-colour painting; and his drawings were executed without admixture of "body colour." Throughout, he was careful and conscientious in his painting, and betrayed no signs of failing power to the last. He was working on several important pictures in oil and water colours within a few weeks of his death.

Mr. Duncan was not only one of the truest artists, but was one of the most liberal-minded of men. He had a good word for everyone, especially for young and struggling artists. He remembered his own early struggles, and was always free to admit that he had to thank the late Mr. Herbert Ingram and the Illustrated London News in a great measure for his ultimate success in life as an artist. In the early years of this Journal he was a frequent contributor to its pages. Besides an excellent series of country scenes, he drew a large number of other subjects chiefly relating to agricultural or maritime life, but all bearing the true stamp of genius. It is remarkable that so many of our eminent water-colour painters should have commenced their artistic life either as engravers or draughtsmen on wood. Not the least distinguished among them was the good man and genuine artist who has just passed away.

An Industrial and Fine Art Exhibition will be opened next Monday, at the Drill-hall, Kingston-on-Thames, by the Duke of Cambridge.

The annual meeting of the Council of and subscribers to the Art Union of London was held on Tuesday in the Adelphi Theatre. The amount of subscriptions received was £13,927, of which £3228 had been allotted for prizes, £614 set apart for promoting works of art for accumulated payments, and £6739 for the printing of the year, almanack, exhibition, report, and reserve fund. For agents' commission and charges, advertisements, printing, postage, and rent, the sum of £3345 had been expended. Mr. George Godwin presided, and Mr. Hallett read the annual report, which stated that the amount to be expended in prizes will thus be allotted:—One work at £100; two at £75; two at £60; four at £50; five at £45; five at £40; eight at £35; eight at £30; eight at £25; ten at £20; fifteen at £15; and twenty at £10. The presentation work for the coming year will be a line engraving by Mr. Lumb Stocks, R.A., and Mr. Charles Jeans from the picture by Mr. J. B. Burgess exhibited at the Royal Academy of 1868, entitled "The Child Stealers."—The report was agreed to, and the drawing of prizes proceeded with, the first (value £100) being drawn for D'Izazil, of Jerez, in Spain,

MR. HENRY WOODS, A.R.A.

THE LATE MR. EDWARD DUNCAN, ARTIST.

A FISHER-GIRL OF LISBON.

The river-side population of the Portuguese capital city on the Tagus presents a variety of picturesque figures, one of which is that of the barefooted maiden, with a basket of fish on her head, briskly stepping from the boat to the quay, and going to sell her fresh wares in the town, where she is likely to find customers for the best of the newly-caught finny creatures, on that coast the most delicious eating in their proper season. As this girl walks boldly and gaily along, she will perhaps be overheard singing a favourite ditty of her sex in Portugal, telling of the possession of five lovers at once, three for the morning, two for the afternoon, with a frank confession of her indifferent behaviour to them all:—

Eu tenho cinco namorados,
Tres a manha, dois de tarde;
A todos elles eu minto,
So a ti fallo a verdade.

But we are not at all inclined to believe her.

NEW ASSOCIATES OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

Mr. George Aitchison, A.R.A., architect and decorative artist, was born in London, in 1825. He received his first education at Merchant Taylors' School; was articled to his father, the late Mr. J. Aitchison, architect, in 1841; became a student of the Royal Academy in 1847; matriculated at London University in 1848; entered University College the same year, and took prizes in mathematics in 1849 and 1850; and obtained the B.A. degree at the University of London in 1850. From 1853 to 1855 he travelled in Italy and France; and joined his father in business in 1859. He became a Fellow of the Royal Institute of British Architects in 1862; and has gained medals at the Philadelphia, Sydney, and Melbourne Exhibitions; he was also commissioned to design the furniture and decorative arrangements of the British Fine-Art Section at the Paris Great Exhibition of 1878. The following year he was appointed an Officer of Public Instruction by the French Government. Among Mr. Aitchison's principal works are large buildings for the London and St. Katharine's Docks Company Offices, in Mark and Mincing Lanes; the Board-room for the Thames Conservancy, and Founders' Hall; Sir Frederick Leighton's house at Kensington, including the decoration of the Arab Hall there; studios and galleries for Mr. Watts, Mr. Calderon, and other artists; houses for Lord Richard Grosvenor; schools, Turkish baths, and shops in various localities. He also designed decorations for H.R.H. Princess Louise in Kensington Palace, and for the houses of several noblemen and gentlemen.

Mr. Henry Woods, A.R.A., painter of figures in combination with landscape and architecture, was born in 1846, at Warrington, and was educated at the Grammar School there. He also commenced his art studies at the school of art of his native town, under Mr. J. Christmas Thompson—who is still master of the school. In 1864 young Woods came to London and studied at South Kensington for some years. Like several other painters who have won distinction, he has drawn largely for the wood engraver in illustration of books and periodicals. He first exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1869, but his more important works date from 1873. Among the earlier of these are "Going Home," "Haymakers," "Convalescents at Highgate," "Good-bye," and "A Good Bargain." For the last few years he has painted at Vienna, and there he has worked, we believe, occasionally with his brother-in-law, Mr. Fildes, A.R.A., and the Dutch painter Van Haanen, whose "Pearl Stringer" obtained a deserved success at our Royal Academy two years ago. We were among the first to note the merit of Mr. Woods' Venetian pictures, among which are "A Venetian Ferry," "Sunshine," "Street Trading in Venice," "The Ducal Courtyard," "The Foot of the Rialto," and "The Gondolier's Courtship."

A FISHER-GIRL OF LISBON.

MR. W. F. DOUGLAS, P.R.S.A.

The new President of the Royal Scottish Academy was born at Edinburgh in 1822, and has passed his life there, with the exception of a year or two spent in Italy and elsewhere. He was a pupil for a few months of Sir William Allan at the Trustees Academy, and afterwards drew much from the sculpture there. Mr. Douglas commenced his career as a portrait-painter, and his first exhibited works were portraits. Subsequently he has practised in almost every department of painting. He has been a regular exhibitor at the Scottish Academy, but has seldom contributed to the London Academy. The list of the painter's works in genre, history, and illustrations of literature—many of them of great merit—is too long even to give a selection from them. In 1851 he was elected an Associate, and in 1854 a full member of the Scottish Academy.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

The first impression among artists and critics of this year's display at Burlington House seems to be that it scarcely reaches the recent average, except in portraiture. It is early to offer an opinion, or pretend to pass a verdict; yet first impressions of pictures, as of persons, are often the truest; and, unfortunately, a Royal Academy Exhibition seldom improves upon acquaintance. Big canvases abound, but the thought or technical merit expended on them is not always commensurate with the size. The exhibition suffers, as we anticipated, from the circumstance that important works in unusual number (by Alma Tadema, Frith, Fildes, and several others) could not be finished in time. But several—more than usual, it strikes us—of the works of the R.A.'s who have put in appearance betray failing powers to a lamentable extent, and that repeatedly and on a large scale. Even Mr. Millais is not always himself, nor Mr. Watts; while the President but intensifies and exaggerates his peculiarities of treatment. There are younger Associates, too, who should be urged to discontinue their "pot-boilers" and betake themselves to serious study. The strength of the exhibition certainly resides in larger proportion than last year in a few foreign pictures and works by "outsiders." The portraits are many of them fine, as already intimated, but there are too many of one pattern from several contributors. The quantity of showy but superficial commonplace work it seems hopeless to find reduced. In technicalities there is an advance if we recall the exhibitions of twenty years back; but this advance is by no means proportionate to the increase of the cultivation of art. If in its extension art is not more shallow, like some stream bursting artificial barriers, it does not generally rise to a much higher level. And notwithstanding boasted improvements in the Academy schools, it is not in the higher technicalities of figures, draughtsmanship, composition, and tone that much improvement is manifest. In these respects we have still much to learn from the Continental schools; but that never will be learnt till our leading artists adopt the foreign system of opening their studios to a body of pupils; and until our national Exhibition, by being enlarged and freely opened to foreign artists, like the Paris Salon, contains sufficient materials for estimating the whole present condition of contemporaneous art.

An enlargement of the exhibition space is more and more sorely needed, if only to represent our native art outside the Academic pale. The Academicians propose, it is said, to add two new rooms to the existing accommodation at Burlington House—a very "small mercy indeed" for which to be thankful, seeing that the number of works by outsiders offered for exhibition have doubled since the Academy removed to Piccadilly. Yet, strange to say, the large lecture-room, which had hitherto been appropriated for pictures (to find room for which the greatest pressure exists), has now been devoted to sculpture, in exchange for the smaller room, No. 6, although previously sculpture was accommodated advantageously, comparatively to its relative deserts. The "Vestibule," moreover, is disused altogether. Nearly 10,000 works are said to have been sent in this year! To justly adjudicate the claims of each of this vast mass, and to fairly allocate those selected according to relative merit, was obviously an impossibility within sixteen or seventeen working days. The selection and hanging must therefore have been little better than a haphazard scramble. And it follows of necessity that some hundreds of works entitled to be submitted to the public judgment are rejected. To our certain knowledge, many of them are at least equal to the works of the average Academician and Associate. For this rapidly growing evil, and all the cruel injustice that it involves, there is a palliative of simple application—one the adoption of which we have often urged. If the sixty R.A.'s and A.R.A.'s will not give up their self-voted rights to each place eight productions of their own, bad or good, in so many of the best positions, let them at least ordain that no "outsider" shall send in more than two. The greatest artist in Europe is not allowed to contribute more than two works to the Paris Salon. By making such rule the number of works presented would be at once reduced to something like manageable proportions; more justice would be done to the outside contributors; they would do more justice to themselves by offering only their best efforts; and consequently a better selection would be seen by the public. The present regulation was made more than one hundred years ago, and it is high time to modify it, now that professional artists have multiplied in the proportion probably of nearly a hundred to one.

In proceeding to review the present gathering, we shall, for the moment, attempt only a cursory survey of some of the more remarkable works, reserving criticism in detail for future articles. In Gallery I., then, we are arrested first by Mr. Pettie's illustration of Hood's "Dream of Eugene Aram," the murderer being impelled to talk to his young pupil of Cain. Close by is the same painter's representation of the Duke of Monmouth when a prisoner, with reddened eyes, crawling to the feet of James II., in that interview which the King in his dastardly revenge granted only to refuse mercy. We may as well also mention here Mr. Pettie's principal work in the Great Room, representing a palmer, worn and grey, relating the story of his travels in the Holy Land to a rather indifferent Saxon thane and his spouse. A smaller canvas would, we think, have sufficed for this subject: both thought and execution seem slight; nor is the dramatic conception in the two first-named works profound. Returning to Room No. 1, we have next a striking fancy by Briton Riviere—a portal, with strange devices, guarded by two leopards; the animals capitably painted, of course. A half-length of Mrs. James Stern (29), in sang de bœuf coloured robe relieved against French tapestry, is the first portrait by Mr. Millais in the order of the walls, and in this and the neighbouring "Dorothy Thorpe" which recalls the "Cinderella," as also in the little Princess Marie (353), daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, our English master seems to have been unwontedly careful, and has used "stippling" in the "carnations" more than usual, relying less on the first spontaneous stroke of the brush; and, in so far as he has done this, his execution seems rather less artistic, and the colouring acquires not altogether harmonious "bloom." In Room II., however, is a portrait of Sir Henry Thompson, the flesh of which inclines, on the contrary, slightly to yellow. But this portrait is instinct with life and character: a marvellous likeness, as all who know the eminent surgeon will say. A noble portrait of Cardinal Newman (1514), in his red robes, marvellously complete, yet transparent in modelling; and half-lengths of Mr. D. Thwaites (553) and Mrs. Budgett (505) complete the number of Mr. Millais's contributions. As we have remarked a certain timidity in some of these works, we cannot refrain from also naming a splendid piece of audacity in the portrait of Miss Thorpe, already named—i.e., the painting of the silver bowl, gilt inside, in the milk in which the little lady is about to soak biscuits for her pet spaniels. Not Velasquez among the old masters, nor Vollon among the moderns, ever hit off a finer bit of still-life.

Resuming the order of the catalogue (though not denying ourselves occasionally the convenience of grouping a given artist's works), we arrive at "Day Dreams" (56), a girl languidly caressing her own hands, by Sir Frederick Leighton. More important is "Wedded" (71), close by—a woman letting her head fall back, in a melting passion of love, towards her mate, who in the same mood kisses the tips of the fingers of her proffered hand over her shoulder. We need not dwell on these, nor on the "Antigone" (474); the reader may readily imagine the sumptuous draperies and Oriental or classical accessories introduced in all three. We must also reserve for future consideration a design (1244) by Sir Frederick for a portion of the decoration of the dome of St. Paul's, which we shall review when noticing the general scheme for that work, as shown in a section of the dome in relieved curvilinear form, in the architectural room with Mr. Poynter's complementary designs depicted thereon. The President's most important work of the year is "Phryne at Eleusis," in the Great Room. It is a colossal nearly nude figure: the Athenian hetaira is loosening the last fillet that binds her almost dishevelled hair (which is of a deep red colour) preparatory to entering the sea at the public festival of the Eleusinian mysteries. She stands under the portico of the Temple of Demeter, through the intercolumniation of which the sea is seen; a mass of dark olive drapery fallen behind her serves to relieve the figure, and with one hand she is unfolding a last swathe of red drapery. Her flesh is of a deep tawny hue, to be accounted for, we assume, as an effect of firelight from a sacrificial rite in progress. But whether from artificial light, or the declining sun, the effect is that of a general local colour or stain rather than a ray. The figure appears taller than the Greek standard; but the sweeping contours and general form are, we need hardly say, very beautiful; though, as inevitably, smooth and waxen in texture, without the subtle indications of the accidents of surface that constitute the higher beauty of natural form, and that would certainly be found in a statue by Praxiteles, or a picture by Apelles from the living Phryne. With all deductions, it is one of the President's most considerable achievements; but we may well ask whether the artificial feeling and decorative motive of such a work is a fitting model for the students of our school, and calculated to win the tolerance of the British public to a display of the female nude—the purest and most ennobling subject for the painter, if only rightly treated—treated with loyal reverence for Nature—idealised, but not eviscerated.

Retracing our steps once more, we pause before a picture (64) by Munkacsy, in which he is far more at home than in the "Christ Before Pilate," reviewed in another column. It shows a lady arranging a bouquet in a gorgeously-furnished apartment, "Avant la fête de papi." The figures and objects are touched with masterly decision, and tell with surprising lustre out of their rich bituminous ground; but there is a want of atmospheric grey, and of the "modesty of Nature." H. W. B. Davis has painted nothing better than his large picture of cattle and sheep under an effect of sunset, which also irradiates the purple hills of "Ross-shire" (145). Van Haanen's (176) interior of a Venetian dressmakers' shop—something similar in motive to his "Pearl Stringers"—will maintain, or almost maintain, his reputation; and very nearly up to the same high level of merit is the scene before the stall of a Venetian bric-à-brac dealer (182) by Mr. H. Woods, the new Associate, whose portrait we engrave this week.

Passing fine portraits by Mr. Oulless and Mr. Holl, we enter the Great Room. Here, worthily occupying the post of honour at its head, is Mr. Goodall's very large impressive picture of the ruins of "Memphis" with the one remaining fallen colossus of Rameses II., lying on the now desolate site in the gathering shades of evening; the rays of the low sun touching only the dome of the modern mosque and a few lofty palms; with no sign of life near, save a solitary fellow who has brought his buffaloes to drink at a pool, and a couple of ibises—no longer guarded as sacred birds in the great temple. Another large composition is Mr. Marks's illustration of "King Henry VI.," representing Jack Cade with his rabblement arrainging Lord Say—a picture with obvious character and humour, but somewhat disappointing. "The Meeting of St. Francis and St. Dominic amongst the Ruins of Ancient Rome" (267), by Mr. Armitage, is suggestive, though rather dry in treatment. The "Molly" (281), of "Wapping Old Stairs" and "Sally in our Alley" (282), by Mr. Leslie (which hang as pendants), have the naive, old-fashioned grace of the painter, but strike us, the "Molly" especially, as too dainty. Frank Dicksee's picture (290) of a young Italian whispering to his lady-love in a garden seat shaded by laurels, is an artistic exercitation on moonlight effect, but we prefer the less honeyed and more robust and pathetic sentiment and meaning of earlier works. Mr. Burgess's Spanish street-scene (294), with a girl embarrassed almost to tears, and the public letter-writer scarcely less puzzled, by the contradictory counsels of the girl's friends, as to the answer she should give to a letter, tells the story well. Mr. Long's principal picture (302) illustrates the song of Deborah in Judges—"Why tarry the wheels of his chariot." The mother of Sisera sits looking anxiously out of a casement, with her maids about her in various attitudes of listening and expectation—one of them weaving a chaplet for the brow that is already pierced by the nail of Jael. The situation is dramatically conceived; but before this, as before his minor works, the suggestion arises that the artist must not relax his efforts as regards technicalities if he would maintain the reputation he has honourably won. Mr. Herbert's large principal picture, "Treasure-Seekers Despoiling a Tomb" (314), and which represents modern Greeks abstracting gold ornaments from a tomb, into which they have sacrilegiously broken, may be commended to the Society for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments. The tomb is that of Philistion, the comic actor, the interesting epitaph on which is quoted in the catalogue. But we must return to this picture; as also to the coast-scenes and landscapes by Mr. Hook; and the noteworthy pictures in the following rooms.

The Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge University has appointed Mr. Matthew Arnold, M.A., to the office of Sir Robert Rede's lecturer for the ensuing year.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

In the Chamber of Deputies on Saturday General Ferrieri, the Minister for War, stated that the amount asked—about £13,000,000—spread over five years, would be employed principally in the construction of forts round the coast and fortifications to defend Rome, and would be sufficient to ensure the complete defence of the country. On Monday the Chamber proceeded with the discussion on the Extraordinary Military Expenditure Bill. On Tuesday the debate was concluded on the condition of the navy. The order of the day pure and simple, which the Government accepted as a vote of confidence, was carried.

The strike among the compositors in Rome has ended, they having to give way.

SPAIN.

Last Saturday evening the Congress of Deputies approved the Franco-Spanish commercial treaty by 237 votes to 59. On Monday a vote of censure on Señor Comacho, the Minister of Finance, was rejected by 152 votes against 46.

The Spanish Hygienic Society held their inaugural meeting on Sunday night. King Alfonso, who was surrounded by a number of eminent physicians, eulogised the objects of the association as calculated to improve the general condition of society, and to fortify the superior physique of the Spanish race, especially as regarded the industrial and agricultural classes. His Majesty's remarks were received with repeated cries of "Long live the King!"

GERMANY.

The Emperor and Empress take daily drives together at Wiesbaden. The Grand Duke Vladimir arrived there yesterday week, and was received at the station by the Emperor William. The Grand Duke left next day, arriving at Berlin in the evening at eight o'clock. He was received at the railway station by the Crown Prince, who accompanied him to the Russian Embassy. The Grand Duke left Berlin for St. Petersburg at eleven. While at Wiesbaden he repeatedly assured the Emperor William that the intentions of the Czar and the Russian people were not of an aggressive character. The object of the Grand Duke Vladimir's visit was to bring the official invitation to the Czar's coronation. The Emperor William will be represented by the Crown Prince.

On Tuesday the Prussian Chamber passed, on the third reading, the bill for completing the network of State railways by the construction of several important branch lines.

In the German Federal Council on Monday the Tobacco Monopoly Bill was adopted by 36 to 22 votes.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Austrian Delegation has all but unanimously approved the credit of 23,739,000 florins asked for by the Government for the troops in Bosnia and Herzegovina; but the Hungarian Delegation insists on a reduction of two million florins.

The trial is proceeding in Vienna of the persons accused of having contributed by culpable negligence to the disaster at the Ring Theatre. It has now been ascertained that the total number of victims by the fire was 384.

RUSSIA.

An Imperial Order has been promulgated in St. Petersburg prohibiting military men from delivering political speeches or publicly expressing opinions on political affairs. Functionaries in the War Office are at the same time reminded that they continue to be prohibited from publishing, without the sanction of their superiors, any printed matter respecting foreign countries.

All trials arising out of the outrages on Russian Jews have been ordered by the Emperor to be proceeded with as urgent.

DENMARK.

The Landthing, or Upper House, of the Rigsdag on Tuesday adopted, by 37 votes to 21, an Order of the Day approving the policy of the Government with regard to fortifications.

AMERICA.

In consequence of numerous complaints of the receipt of sanded cotton from America, the committee of the New York Cotton Exchange have been making inquiry, and have come to the conclusion that the sanding is due mostly to atmospheric causes—the dryness of last season causing the sand-dust to be beaten into the cotton bolls.

Nearly 20,000 emigrants, consisting largely of Germans and Italians, arrived in New York last week.

A cyclone has passed over Monticello (Mississippi) by which twenty-one persons were killed and many others injured.

The steamer City of Sanford has been destroyed by fire on the St. John's river, Florida. Several lives were lost.

CANADA.

The Dominion House of Commons on Thursday week passed the bill for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The bill provides that the line shall go through some other than the Yellowhead Pass. Yesterday week the House passed unanimously an address to the Queen praying that a form of self-government should be granted to Ireland, and that clemency should be extended to the Irish political prisoners; and Sir J. Macdonald said he would send the address to the Senate for its concurrence. On Saturday the House rejected, by 104 to 58, a motion in favour of Canada negotiating directly with foreign States for commercial treaties.

The British Columbia Legislature has been prorogued.

AUSTRALIA.

The Government of Victoria is materially strengthening the defences of the colony.

The Melbourne Argus reports that new pearling grounds, supposed to be from fifteen to twenty miles long, have been discovered off Beagle Bay, on the north coast of Western Australia.

NEW ZEALAND.

Upon the resignation of the Hon. John Hall as Premier, in consequence of continued ill-health, the Ministry was re-constituted—the Hon. Frederick Whitaker, formerly Premier and Attorney-General in Mr. Hall's Administration, being now once more Premier. All the other Ministers have been reappointed to the offices they held in Mr. Hall's Cabinet.

Mr. Barnum has sent to the Consul at Bangkok, for presentation to the King of Siam, a formal petition for the loan on his Majesty's own terms, of a white elephant.

Some coal-mines in China have been closed because the Censor has expressed a solemn fear that their continued working might release the Earth Dragon, and bring trouble on the Imperial family.

It is reported that the schooner Pet, from Bunbury to Adelaide, was struck by a sperm whale about fifty miles south of Cape Leuwin, and foundered in a few minutes. All on board escaped except the captain in his cabin, who was drowned.

At the British Embassy, Constantinople, on the 20th inst., was solemnised the marriage of Miss Hamilton, sister of the Countess of Dufferin, with Mr. Arthur Nicolson, second son of Sir Frederick W. E. Nicolson, C.B., in presence of many of the Turkish Ministers of State, the diplomatic body, and other personages of distinction.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The House of Lords reassembled after the Easter Recess at four o'clock instead of five on the 20th inst. As this earlier hour of meeting was agreed to at the suggestion of Lord Camperdown, it might fairly have been anticipated that the noble Lord would have provided the House with some tid-bit for discussion. But up to date neither his Lordship nor any other of the younger peers has given substantial reason for the assembling of the House an hour earlier than heretofore. On the Thursday and Friday of last week, literally the only business transacted worth mentioning was the passing through its final stage of the Duke of Albany's Establishment Bill, and the giving of Royal Assent thereto by Commission. The Earl of Dunraven, it is true, on Monday (with the frankness presumably of the candid friend who would not be averse to accepting office), poured a rhetorical flank fire into the Ministerial Bench on account of the alleged uncertain note which the Prime Minister emitted in speaking of the Irish Court of Appeal's decision with regard to the case of "Adams v. Dunreath." In the present critical juncture of affairs in Ireland, however, it may be submitted that the cold criticism of Lord Dunraven, and the trenchant attacks of Earl Cairns and the Marquis of Salisbury on Mr. Gladstone and the Irish Land Act would be more appropriate in a University or Fleet-street discussion forum than in Parliament. Undoubtedly smart and pungent as the speeches of the Leaders of the Opposition were as arguments against the hostility the Premier evinced to the Lords' Committee, especially as the Government itself now admits the necessity of revising the Land Act, the reasonableness of these lively assaults, and also of the Earl of Galloway's and Lord Salisbury's animadversions last Tuesday on Mr. Gladstone's rather ambiguous utterance concerning threatening letters, may be gravely doubted. Rarely has there been a crisis when the co-operation of both great parties of the State has been more needed for the pacification of Ireland.

Coming to the Lower House, Mr. Forster has furnished a noteworthy instance of the angry feeling which can be in an instant aroused by the lack of tact or imagination on the part of a Minister. Great sympathy has indubitably been deserved by the well-meaning Bradford Secretary for Ireland. In the place of measureless abuse, in the teeth of well-nigh overwhelming difficulties, Mr. Forster has sturdily striven to keep the peace in unhappy Ireland. But the right hon. gentleman was singularly wanting in judgment in returning so inadequate a reply to Mr. Sexton on Thursday week as that Mr. Clifford Lloyd knew nothing of Inspector Smith's circular to the Police for his protection. Nothing could have been more mischievous than this barbarous circular, which absolutely promised constables absolution if in the reckless use of firearms they should in error shoot an innocent man. Taking advantage of Mr. Forster's strange omission to reprimand the writer of this official document, Mr. Sexton moved the adjournment of the House in order to denounce the act with eloquence and indignation. What was the result? Mr. Forster brought down upon his head a torrent of rebukes from other Home Rule members, Mr. Shaw and Mr. Mitchell Henry joining in the condemnation of the circular, Mr. Redmond being expelled for the sitting for accusing the Secretary for Ireland of dishonesty, and Mr. O'Connor Power in an impromptu speech of exceptional power giving the Irish Executive a timely hint that the hour has arrived to govern Ireland according to Irish ideas. In fine, hours were wasted simply because Mr. Forster did not say at the spur of the moment what so conscientious a statesman must readily allow was the right thing to say.

Whilst this Irish tempest raged, a sweet little cherub, so to speak, sat up aloft in the gallery, and looked after "poor Jack" and her Majesty's Navy. This was Lord Henry Lennox, who, after spending his days and nights in poring over French bluebooks, was ready to descend, and, by the quotation of a formidable array of figures, endeavour to persuade the Secretary to the Admiralty that it was absolutely necessary for England to greatly increase the number of her ironclads if she would cope with France alone on the sea. But Mr. Trevelyan disputed the facts and figures alike of Lord Henry Lennox, and stoutly maintained that Britannia was quite as ready to rule the waves now as in the days of Nelson. All the same, so high and practical an authority as Mr. W. H. Smith reminded the Admiralty that it would be advisable to have our ships of war readier than they are for any emergency.

The vote of £90,921 for the public parks of London was yesterday week objected to by Mr. Labouchere on the score that the Metropolitan Council ought to pay at least for Victoria, Kensington, and Battersea Parks; but Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, able and zealous as First Commissioner, had the satisfaction of seeing the vote sanctioned at last.

The Budget which Mr. Gladstone introduced on Monday in a speech two hours long—an overflowing House assembling, as usual, to hear the Financial Statement—was probably one of the least satisfactory the Prime Minister has ever produced. Expenditure "growing," and revenue "sluggish"—quite a Dick Swiveller way of putting the question—there was only the small surplus of £350,000 on the right side of the national ledger for the past year, the revenue being £85,822,000, and the expenditure £85,472,000. From the point of view of social progress, the most satisfactory facts the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to adduce were that the revenue from the duties on drink had fallen off considerably, and that the deposits in savings banks had increased by millions. With regard to 1882-3, Mr. Gladstone estimated the revenue at £84,935,000, and the expenditure at £84,630,000, giving a surplus of £305,000. With this comparatively small sum in hand, he would be happy when the hour was ripe to fulfil his promise, and abolish the Highway Rate. But it would not be sufficient by itself. Amid much laughter—provoked possibly at the notion that the mountain had laboured and brought forth a mouse—Mr. Gladstone mentioned that private carriages would be additionally taxed—the duty on four-wheeled carriages being raised from £2 2s. to £3 3s., and that on two-wheeled carriages from 15s. to £1 1s.; the £247,000 yielded by this increase being put by till it could contribute to the end in view. This was literally the gist of the Budget.

Whether the Government are not employing stringency in a wrong direction in their Parliamentary Elections Bill may at least be worth consideration, in the face of the many objections urged to it on both sides of the House on Tuesday, when Mr. Callan talked the measure out for the day. The same day Mr. Leighton led to a serviceable debate on the Lunacy Laws, which will, it is to be hoped, bring about a stricter supervision of the insane who are at large—a large class, indeed, according to Carlyle.

The Irish Land Act came up for criticism again by the Commons on Wednesday. Mr. Parnell's bill for the Amendment of the Act in the direction of wiping off arrears of rent due previous to the August of 1880, the revision of leases, the definition of improvements, and the facilitating of purchases, found an inflexible introducer in Mr. Redmond. Mr. Gladstone admitted the necessity of dealing with the arrears, and announced the Government's intention of legislating on this point in the course of the Session. What he had to say with regard to purchase it would be proper to postpone till Mr. W. H. Smith's proposal was before the House. On the other points, it would be premature to touch this year. While intimating it might be necessary to apply for fresh powers for the maintenance of order in Ireland, the Prime Minister earnestly assured Irish members that compulsory government was entirely repugnant to the Ministry.

THE COURT.

Another important transaction in the life of her Majesty has been performed this week in the marriage of her youngest and last unmarried son, Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, with Princess Helen of Waldeck, which was solemnised on Thursday at Windsor. The Queen upon this occasion received at the Castle all the members of her family in England; also her son-in-law, the Grand Duke of Hesse, and his eldest daughter, Princess Victoria; the King and Queen of the Netherlands, the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, the Crown Prince of Denmark, and Duke Ernest Gunther of Schleswig-Holstein. Her Majesty evinced the utmost interest in all the preparations for the marriage, inspecting the arrangements of St. George's Chapel during progress, and also drove through the Royal borough to see the decorations. The Castle was filled with guests, and Frogmore and Cumberland Lodge were brought into requisition for the accommodation of visitors. An account of the arrival of the bride, on Tuesday, and of the wedding ceremony, on Thursday, will be found in another page.

State Banquets were given by her Majesty on the eve of the Royal marriage and on the wedding day.

Earlier in the week the Queen formally received addresses of congratulation on her providential escape from assassination from the Corporation of the City of London, from her Majesty's Commission of Lieutenancy of the City of London, from the body of English Presbyterian Ministers resident in and near the cities of London and Westminster, from the Corporation of the City of Edinburgh, and the Corporation of the City of Dublin. Princess Beatrice was present. The several deputations lunched in the Waterloo Chamber. A guard of honour of the Scots Guards, with the band of the regiment, was mounted in the quadrangle of the castle. The Queen also received by the hand of the Duke of Connaught a similar congratulatory address on behalf of the Treasurer and Masters of the Bench of Gray's Inn.

Her Majesty, too, gave audience to Earl Granville, who afterwards introduced M. Tissot, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary from the French Republic; and Sir Peter Brilla, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from Greece, to present their credentials. The Queen also received the Serbian Minister, who presented Royal letters announcing King Milan's assumption of the Royal title, and at the same time delivering the insignia of the Serbian Order of Takova.

Mr. A. Bassano has photographed her Majesty, with the infant Princess Margaret of Connaught and Princess Beatrice. The Queen has been much grieved by the loss of a highly valued servant, Mr. Taft, who died at the Shaw Farm on Saturday. He had had for twenty-four years the management of the several Royal farms in the vicinity of Windsor Great Park. Her Majesty sent a wreath to be placed on Canon Pearson's coffin at his funeral at Sonning.

A Levée was held by the Prince of Wales on behalf of the Queen last Monday at St. James's Palace, at which the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Connaught and Strathearn, the Duke of Cambridge, Prince Christian, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar were present. The usual state etiquette was observed, and nearly 300 presentations were made.

Her Majesty will visit Epping Forest next Saturday. Drawingrooms will be held by the Queen on the following Tuesday and Thursday at Buckingham Palace.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Nawab-Ikbal-ood-Dowlah of Hyderabad was received by the Prince and Princess of Wales at Marlborough House last Saturday. In the evening their Royal Highnesses were at the Royal Italian Opera. Divine service was attended by the Prince and Princess and their daughters on Sunday; and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught lunched with their Royal Highnesses. On Monday the Prince visited the Grand Duke of Hesse and Princess Victoria at Buckingham Palace, and Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg at Claridge's Hotel. The Grand Duke and his daughter returned the visit and lunched with the Prince and Princess at Marlborough House. Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg lunched with their Royal Highnesses on Tuesday. The Prince and Princess, with their daughters, visited the Royal Academy, and in the evening their Royal Highnesses were at the Royal Comedy Theatre. The Prince and Princess, with Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, went to Windsor Castle on Wednesday for the Duke of Albany's wedding; and yesterday (Friday) their Royal Highnesses gave a party at Marlborough House to meet the King and Queen of the Netherlands. The Prince and the King of the Netherlands will be present at the Royal Academy opening dinner to-night at Burlington House.

His Royal Highness and the Duke of Edinburgh have accepted the invitation of the Lord Mayor to be present at the Mayor's banquet at the Mansion House, on June 17.

The Prince was represented by Lieutenant-General Sir Dighton Probyn at the funeral of the late Sir Henry Cole, at the Brompton Cemetery.

The Duke of Edinburgh made his annual official inspection of the London Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers last Saturday at the West India Docks. His Royal Highness and the Duchess and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught went to the St. James's Theatre on Monday evening.

The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz arrived at St. James's Palace on Monday from Germany.

Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, who were staying at Claridge's Hotel, went to the Opéra Comique on Monday evening, and left the next day for Windsor Castle.

The King and Queen of the Netherlands left Windsor Castle after the Royal marriage, and are at Buckingham Palace. Their Majesties will visit the Guildhall in state next Tuesday, when the King will receive the freedom of the City.

Strawberry Hill villa is reported to have passed into the hands of an American Hotel Company.

Our Portrait of the late Mr. C. R. Darwin is from a photograph by Mr. Ernest Edwards; that of the late Mr. Samuel Gurney, from one by Messrs. Elliott and Fry; that of the late Mr. Edward Duncan, from one by Mr. E. M. Haigh; that of Mr. G. Aitchison, A.R.A., one of Mr. Van der Weyde's electric light photographs; that of Mr. G. F. Bodley, A.R.A., one by Mr. S. A. Walker; and that of Mr. H. Woods, A.R.A., one by Vianelli, of Venice.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

Mr. R. S. Mitford has been appointed to a Commissionership of Prisons; and Mr. C. S. Murdoch, of the Home Office, succeeds Mr. Mitford as Sir W. Harcourt's secretary.

Mr. Edward Bellamy, F.R.C.S., surgeon to Charing-cross Hospital, will begin his course of lectures on the "Human Form," at South Kensington Museum, on May 5.

By order of Lord Brabazon, twelve seats have been placed on the Embankment—at Cheyne-walk, Pimlico Pier, and opposite Milbank.

It was stated at a meeting of the Durham Miners' Permanent Relief Fund at Newcastle that, by four recent colliery explosions, the association had incurred a liability of £42,000.

Mr. Edward James Stanley, the Conservative candidate for West Somerset, was on Tuesday elected without opposition, in succession to Major Vaughan Lee, resigned.

On Tuesday the National Auricular Society held their annual show at the Horticultural Gardens, in South Kensington. The show was exceptionally good, nineteen growers having sent contributions.

At a meeting of the Geographical Society on Monday evening the President announced that the gold medals of the year have been awarded to Dr. Nachtigal and Sir John Kirk, British Consul at Zanzibar.

A Civil List pension of £80 per annum has been awarded to the widow of Mr. John Hill Burton, late Historiographer Royal in Scotland, and the author of many valuable contributions to literature and history.

Mr. Parnell landed at Kingstown on Monday night, and was greeted with some cheering; he proceeded by train to Westland-row, whence he took a cab, and drove by a circuitous route to Kilmainham, where he surrendered himself at the termination of his parole.

Mr. Ray Lankester, appointed a short time ago by the Crown to the chair of Natural History in the Edinburgh University, has resigned the appointment; and Professor Ewart, holding the corresponding chair in Aberdeen University, has been appointed to succeed him.

The decoration of the Victoria Cross has been conferred upon Lieutenant Henry Lysons (now Adjutant) and Private Edmund Fowler (since discharged), of the 2nd Battalion the Cameronians, the wing battalion of which is stationed at Shorncliffe, for gallant services rendered in Zululand.

Mr. W. Bowen Rowlands, Q.C., of the South Wales and Chester Circuit, has been elected a Bencher of the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn, in place of the late Lord Justice Lush; and Mr. Edward Clarke, Q.C., M.P., has been elected a Bencher of the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. W. J. Bovill, Q.C.

The School Board for London reassembled on the 20th inst., after the Easter recess. A motion by Miss Helen Taylor in favour of free education in all the schools of the Board gave rise to a long debate. The motion was got rid of by means of "the previous question," which was carried by a majority of nearly two to one.

Mr. Boehm, R.A., has been commissioned by the Duke of Bedford to execute the statue of Sir Francis Drake for Tavistock. Not only does Tavistock claim the honour of the great sea captain's birth, but, as the Duke finds pleasure in reminding all who take an interest in the Drake Tercentenary, the hero was the godson of one of his Grace's ancestors.

A paper on the mineral resources of India and their development was read at the Society of Arts yesterday week by Professor V. Ball, late of the Geological Survey of that country. The lecturer described the chief mineral products of India, and urged the necessity for affording increased facilities for mining operations generally, and of speedy and liberal legislation for that purpose.

A valuable binocular glass was presented at Aberdeen on Monday by the Lord Provost to Robert Bissett, late master of the steamer Bancheri, of Aberdeen; and a gold chronometer watch to John S. Scroggie, mate of the steamer—the gifts of the German Government, in recognition of the services rendered by the recipients in saving the crew of the German ship Alwaine during the storm of July 27.

The Emperor of Russia having intimated his wish to stand sponsor for the second infant son of Mr. and Mrs. S. de Bustros, the baptism, according to the rites of the Greek Church, took place at their residence, 44, Queen's-gate, on Saturday last. His Imperial Majesty was represented by Prince Lobanoff, the Russian Ambassador, who acted in a similar capacity when the late Emperor stood godfather for M. de Bustros's first son.

In London 2683 births and 1573 deaths were registered last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births exceeded by 28, while the deaths were 130 below, the average numbers in the corresponding week of the last ten years. The deaths included 8 from smallpox, 36 from measles, 16 from scarlet fever, 19 from diphtheria, 153 from whooping-cough, 9 from enteric fever, 13 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and not one from either from typhus or from simple cholera.

We understand that Baronetries are about to be conferred upon Mr. F. A. Milbank, member for the North Riding of Yorkshire; Mr. J. W. Pease, member for South Durham; Mr. H. H. Vivian, member for Glamorganshire; Mr. M. A. Bass, member for East Stafford; Mr. C. E. Adam, of Blair Adam; and Mr. A. Matheson, member for Ross and Cromarty. The honour of a baronetcy was also offered to Mr. Thomas Ashton, of Manchester, and Mr. M. T. Bass, member for Derby, but declined.

A full-sized model of the colossal statue of Mr. Gladstone which it is proposed to erect at Bow-road, at the east end of the metropolis, was exhibited on Tuesday in a temporary studio fitted up on the Thames embankment, close to St. Stephen's Club. The statue, which is the work of Mr. Albert Bruce Joy, and will be cast in bronze, is said to be an excellent and pleasing likeness of the Premier. The cost of the statue and pedestal will be £2000, the whole of which has been subscribed, chiefly in the locality in which the statue is about to be placed.

The Lord Mayor on Monday received from the Duke of Connaught, the Ranger of Epping Forest, an intimation that the visit of the Queen to Epping Forest will be paid on the afternoon of Saturday, May 6. Her Majesty will proceed by special train direct from Windsor to Chingford, where the Royal carriages will be in waiting, and thence the Queen will drive to High Beech, where the most extensive view of the beautiful scenery of the forest is to be obtained. At this spot an amphitheatre will be erected capable of holding 2000 persons, and an address from the Corporation of London will be presented to her Majesty by the Lord Mayor. The Queen will then formally declare Epping Forest dedicated to the free use and enjoyment of the public for all time. At the conclusion of this brief ceremony, her Majesty will return to Chingford, and thence by train to Windsor.

MAUSOLEUM OF PRINCESS CHARLOTTE AT CLAREMONT.

THE GARDEN OF ASHBURNHAM HOUSE, WESTMINSTER.

THE LATE MR. SAMUEL GURNEY.

This gentleman, who died on the 4th inst., was one of the well-known family of the Gurneys, leading members of the Society of Friends, who have borne part in many philanthropic movements since the beginning of the nineteenth century. He was born in 1816, a son of Mr. Samuel Gurney, of Ham House, Essex, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. James Sheppard, of Upton, Essex. During many years he was a principal partner in the great discounting house of Overend, Gurney, and Co., afterwards transformed into a Limited Liability Company, which unfortunately broke down in the commercial crisis of May, 1866. The profits of that business, while conducted by the private firm, had been reckoned at £250,000 yearly; but its failure ultimately, with liabilities amounting to £11,000,000, inflicted a severe blow on the credit and trade of the country. Mr. Samuel Gurney, personally, held a most respectable position in the City, and was a Director of the Alliance Assurance Company, and of the Submarine Telegraph Company; he represented the boroughs of Penryn and Falmouth in the House of Commons from 1857 to 1868, and filled the office of High Sheriff of Surrey in 1861, being a magistrate for that county. He was one of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and took part in the proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society, and in various undertakings for the promotion of education and social charity. He married, in 1837, a daughter of Mr. W. F. Reynolds, of Carshalton, and that lady has survived her husband.

THE PETERBOROUGH EXHIBITION.

The Right Hon. Earl Spencer, K.G., President of the Council, who has an estate in the neighbourhood of Peterborough, on Monday last week opened the Industrial and Fine Arts Exhibition in that town. We give an illustration of the interior of the Exhibition Hall, which is at the Skating Rink, and seems to have been arranged with much skill and taste by a local committee, including the Mayor, Alderman J. Thompson, as Chairman, Mr. Councillor Little, as Vice-Chairman, Mr. H. L. Clark, honorary treasurer, and the Rev. H. W. Orford and Mr. Rowland Hill, honorary secretaries. Contributions have been sent in not only from the district ten miles round Peterborough, within which the exhibitors are entitled to the prizes offered, but also from London and other cities. Among the productions of local manufacture are fine specimens of brass-work and tool-making, of wood-turning and carving, a beautiful reredos of carved oak, made in this town for Bangor Cathedral, and another for Grantham parish church, both the workmanship of the Mayor's own manufactory; some instructive models of military fortification and defences, by the Northamptonshire Engineer Volunteer Corps; interesting architectural models, useful improved agricultural implements; some fine pottery and tiles; and a superb bride-cake, by Mr. Todd, baker and confectioner. Woollen, silk, and cotton fabrics of an ornamental character are furnished by Leeds, Huddersfield, Leicester, and other centres of the manufacturing industries; while the collection of pictures and sculpture, and of decorative art, partly lent by private owners, partly from South Kensington, is rich in various attractions. Earl Spencer, who was accompanied by the Countess, was met by the Bishop of Peterborough and the Dean of the noble cathedral, together with the Mayor, and the Duke of Grafton and other nobility and gentry of that neighbourhood. The exhibition is likely to prove a complete success.

THE MAUSOLEUM OF PRINCESS CHARLOTTE.

Those of our readers who are past middle age can perhaps remember to have heard some of their elders speak with regretful sympathy of the untimely death of a Royal lady, a young wife, the only daughter of George IV. and Queen Caroline, but who died before her father, then Prince of Wales, came to the throne, and who was spared the pain of seeing her mother repudiated and prosecuted by the King's order for alleged unfaithfulness to the marriage vow. The Princess Charlotte of Wales, born in 1796, as the sole child of the Heir Apparent to the Crown, becoming after the separation of her parents the most likely inheritor of the Royal title, was for some years regarded with hopeful interest by great part of the English nation, when the unhappy condition of mental infirmity suffered by her grandfather and the deserved unpopularity of her father had cast a gloomy shadow over the prospects of the Royal family. Her marriage, in 1816, to Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, who afterwards became the first King of the Belgian independent monarchy, was hailed with general satisfaction as the harbinger of better days for the Court, and for those social interests which are deeply concerned in seeing persons of exalted rank maintain a high and pure example of domestic life. These hopes were sadly disappointed in the November of the following year, when the youthful Princess, after giving birth to a child that did not live, was taken from the home and husband she had so recently found, dying at Claremont amidst the sincerest expressions of public sorrow. Our illustration represents the small Gothic edifice in Claremont Park, originally designed by her own order for an alcove, but which after her death was completed by Prince Leopold for a Mausoleum or monumental temple in memory of his lamented consort. The estate and mansion of Claremont, having been settled on her and her husband for life, remained the property of the late King Leopold I. till his decease, when it again reverted to the Crown.

THE GARDEN OF ASHBURNHAM HOUSE.

The controversy that went on for some weeks, in the autumn of last year, upon the proposal to make a new appropriation of this old house, with the respective claims of Westminster School and of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster Abbey to be regarded as its most fitting occupants, will not have been forgotten. As one of the buildings designed by Inigo Jones, Ashburnham House may be deemed to have some interest for the seeker of architectural antiquities in London, but it has no particular feature of stateliness or beauty, except a fine staircase, which will in any case be thought worthy of preservation. It is situated in the south walk of the Abbey Cloisters, and has long been used as the residence of one of the Westminster Canons, its last tenant being the late Rev. Lord John Thynne. The garden is secluded and pleasant, and commands a view of the south transept of the Abbey, with the wall of the Refectory, and the raised garden terrace, which we have delineated in the sketch engraved for this week's publication. It shows a handsome flight of steps, now being removed, which formed an additional ornament to the garden scene.

Lord Grantley has returned 20 per cent to his Yorkshire tenants. It is his Lordship's intention to grant fresh agreements, whereby any outgoing tenant will receive liberal compensation for unexhausted improvements.

The statistical returns from the circuits in the three London districts of the Wesleyan Methodist Society have been made up, and show an increase during the connexional year of 800 members, with upwards of 1400 on probation, besides 2000 young persons meeting in the junior society classes. It is anticipated, from the returns received at the Conference Office from the provincial districts, that there will be a substantial increase also in the provincial membership; whilst encouraging reports are being daily received from the foreign missionary stations of the society.

INDUSTRIAL AND FINE ARTS EXHIBITION AT PETERBOROUGH.

MUSIC.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The opening of the new season of this establishment, on Tuesday week, was duly recorded by us. Since the performance of Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots" on that occasion, as already noticed, the proceedings have included the re-appearance, on the following Thursday, of Madame Sembrich as the heroine in "Lucia di Lammermoor," the character in which this lady made her debut here in 1880. Again last week she sang with brilliant execution, especially in the cavatina "Regnava nel silenzio," in the contract scene, and in the scene of delirium, in which last she roused the audience to enthusiasm. The cast included Signor Frapolli as Edgardo, Signor Pandolfini as Enrico, Signor I. Corsi as Arturo, and Signor Silvestri as Raimondo. Signor Bevilacqua conducted. On Saturday M. Bouhy made a very successful first appearance as Mefistofele in "Faust," his singing and acting having been throughout of a high order of artistic excellence. Mlle. Olga Bergh, who was announced to make her debut as Margherita, was prevented by indisposition, and her place was supplied by Madame Valleria, whose performance was throughout of high excellence. The cast included Madame Trebelli as Siebel, Mlle. Ghiotti as Marta, Signor Frapolli as Faust, Signor Cotogni as Valentino, and Signor Raguer as Wagner. M. Dupont conducted this performance.

On Monday Rossini's "Guglielmo Tell" was given, with Signor Mierzwinsky as Arnoldo, in which character that gentleman sang with magnificent effect, especially in the great duet with Tell, the yet greater trio with him and Walter, and in Arnoldo's final solo, "Corriam"—in each of which the singer's exceptionally high chest notes and his fine declamation were displayed with special success. The opera was altogether finely rendered, the cast having included Madame Valleria as Mathilde, Mlle. Ghiotti as Eduige, Mlle. Velm as Jenny, Signor Cotogni as Tell, Signor De Reszke as Walter, and Signori Scolari, Raguer, and I. Corsi, respectively, as Gessler, Melchthal, and the Fisherman. The overture, brilliantly played, was encored from the "Allegro." M. Dupont conducted.

"Faust" and "Lucia di Lammermoor" were announced for repetition, respectively, on Tuesday and Thursday; and this (Saturday) evening Madame Albani makes her first appearance this season as Violetta in "La Traviata."

The first of Mr. Ganz's new series of orchestral concerts—at St. James's Hall—on Saturday afternoon, brought forward, for the first time in England, Liszt's symphony in illustration of Dante's "Divina Commedia." Of the three movements, "Inferno," "Purgatorio," and "Paradiso," the two latter are to be preferred, as being less offensive than the incoherent noise which prevails in the first division. The work altogether is devoid of genuine musical thought and structural skill; and, like other pretentious pieces by the same composer, depends for its effect on violent orchestral effects. The last movement includes a "Magnificat" for female choir based on a Gregorian chant. This and the difficult instrumental details were excellently rendered. Herr Ondrick made a highly successful first appearance, and was greatly applauded for his fine performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Other items of the concert call for no comment. Mr. Ganz conducted ably.

Madame Christine Nilsson sang, at the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday afternoon, Handel's "Angels ever bright and fair"—and Margherita's music of the Garden Scene from "Faust" in association with Madame Trebelli (Siebel), Mr. Maas (Faust), Signor Foli (Mefistofele), and Madame De Vaney (Marta). The scene was to have been given with the characters in costume, but Madame Nilsson objected to this on account of the recent loss of her husband. She sang with fine effect, and was enthusiastically received. The concert, which comprised other details, was under the direction of Mr. W. Carter.

Last Saturday's Crystal Palace concert included the first performance in England of a new symphony by Anton Dvorák, which met with great success. As it will soon be repeated at a London concert, we shall take that opportunity of speaking of its merits and characteristics.

Madame Sophie Menter gave the first of two recitals at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon, when the eminent pianist played with admirable execution a series of pieces in various styles, in each of which she was enthusiastically applauded. Her second recital takes place on Friday afternoon next.

The Bach Choir's second and last concert of the season offered a programme of high classical interest. Of the performances we must speak next week.

Mr. Oscar Beringer's annual pianoforte recital took place at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, when his programme was of great and varied interest.

The final concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society took place at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) evening, when Handel's oratorio "Solomon," with Costa's additional accompaniments, was performed. The soloists announced were Miss A. Williams and A. Vernon, Madame Patey, Mr. H. Guy, and Mr. Burgon. Apart from this being the last concert of the society, great interest was added from the expected presence of Sir Michael Costa to direct the performance, which closes the society's operations and fiftieth year of its existence.

At the Alexandra Palace there will be a grand musical festival this (Saturday) afternoon, under the immediate patronage of Princess Mary Adelaide, Duchess of Teck. Mr. W. Carter's "Placida" and the "Stabat Mater" will be given; Madame Christine Nilsson, Madame Antonette Sterling, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Signor Foli, and other artistes taking part in it. The orchestra and chorus will number 1000 performers. Conductor, Mr. W. Carter.

Herr Hermann Franke (director of the German opera at Drury Lane Theatre, and of the Richter concerts) announces his eighth series of chamber concerts, to take place, at the Marlborough Rooms, beginning on Tuesday afternoon next, when the programme is to consist entirely of English music.

Mr. Charles Hallé's Recitals will this year be given at the Grosvenor Gallery (under the altered title of "Chamber Music Concerts"), beginning on Wednesday evening, May 10; the remaining seven performances taking place on the following Wednesday evenings. Concerted music, as well as solo pieces, will be included in the programmes.

The fifth of this year's concerts of the Philharmonic Society has been postponed to May 11; Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost" being announced for the sixth (and last) concert.

A fourth series of six "Symphony Concerts," conducted by Mr. Charles Hallé, will be given at St. James's Hall during May and June, beginning on Monday next. Many important works will be performed, and the arrangements include the co-operation of artists engaged in the German Opera Company at Her Majesty's Theatre, and the association of the eminent violinist, Herr Wilhelmj. Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be given at the first concert, and his Missa Solemnelle at the sixth and last performance, on June 22. Herr Straus is to be the leading violinist, and Mr. O. Lemmer the chorus director.

The proceeds of the concerts are to be given to the funds of the Royal College of Music.

Instead of the usual series of concerts of the "Musical Union," only one "Grand Matinée" will be given by M. Lasserre, who succeeded Mr. John Ella in the management, on his retirement after many years' exercise of that office.

The fifth season of the Richter concerts will begin at St. James's Hall on May 3, and be continued on the 15th and 22nd of the month, on June 2, 12, and 26. Among many important features, Liszt's "Graner Messe" will be given for the first time in England, Brahms's new pianoforte concerto will be played by Mr. Eugene D'Albert, and Beethoven's choral symphony and his Mass in D ("Missa Solemnis") will be included in the programmes. Herr E. Schiever is the leading violinist, and Herr Frantzen the chorus director.

Mr. Gustave Pradeau's second pianoforte recital is announced for Tuesday afternoon next at Kensington Townhall; and in the evening of the same day the South London Choral Association give their eighth concert of English music at St. James's Hall.

Mr. George Gear will give his concert next Tuesday afternoon at St. George's Hall. An excellent programme, both vocal and instrumental, is announced.

A concert was given on the 19th inst. by Mr. Sexton's choir of eighty voices at the Grosvenor Hall, Pimlico, in aid of the funds of the institute in connection with the Westminster schools. The Victoria Glee Club rendered some excellent glees. Mr. Cox was the accompanist, and Mr. W. Sexton, of Westminster Abbey, director and conductor.

The Merchant Taylors' Company have voted 1000 guineas, payable in five annual instalments of 200 guineas each, towards the scheme for the establishment of a Royal College of Music. Meetings in connection with the proposed college were held last Saturday at Nottingham and Norwich, when resolutions to aid in the work were adopted.

At the Royal Academy of Music the Llewelyn Thomas gold medal was competed for last week. There were sixteen candidates, and the medal was awarded to Kate Hardy. The Evill prize (a purse of ten guineas) was also competed for. There were six candidates, and the prize was awarded to John G. Robertson. The Santley prize (a purse of ten guineas) was also competed for. There were thirteen candidates, and the prize was awarded to Beatrice Davenport.

GERMAN OPERA IN LONDON.

The arrangements for the important and interesting schemes to which we have previously drawn attention are now nearly complete, and the performances announced at Her Majesty's Theatre will begin on Friday next with "Das Rheingold," the introductory portion of the Nibelungen operas, the other divisions of which—"Die Walküre," "Siegfried," and "Götterdämmerung"—will be given, respectively, on the following Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday. The thorough nationality of the performances in all their details will give every opportunity for Wagner's music to realise the composer's intended effects. The principal solo singers—eminent in association with Wagner's stage music—are Herr Niemann (the renowned tenor and the original Siegmund at Bayreuth), Frauen Vogl, Reicher-Kindermann, and Sachse-Hofmeister, Fräulein Riegler, and Schreier; Herr Vogl, Herr Scaria, Herr Reichmann, Herr Wiegand, and Herr Eilers. The orchestra and chorus will be brought over from Germany; and Herr Seidl, of the Leipzig Opera—specially approved by Wagner—is the conductor. The splendid scenery, properties, and decorations prepared for the first production of the works at Bayreuth in 1876 will be imported for use here, and the direction of the enterprise is in the competent hands of Herr Angelo Neumann, to whom Wagner has intrusted the exclusive right of representation of these works. The final rehearsals will be superintended by the composer, who is expected to be present at some of the performances. The business arrangements have long been zealously promoted by Messrs. Schulz-Curtius, who have issued a very useful compendious handbook, giving analyses (in English) of the subjects of the dramas, and quotations of leading points in the music.

The Drury Lane performances will also be distinctively national in character. Herr Richter—long famous at Vienna, and recently so here in connection with the excellent concerts named after him—is to be the conductor. The chorus and solo singers will be imported, the former from the Hamburg Opera, the latter having been successfully associated with Wagner's works and other operas at various German theatres, and the orchestra will be that of the famous Richter concerts. The dates of these performances are May 18, 23, 25, and 30, June 1, 6, 8, 13, 15, 20, 22, and 27 for the first series; and May 20, 24, 27, and 31, and June 3, 7, 10, 14, 17, 21, 24, and 28, for the second series. During this period, Wagner's "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," and "Tristan und Isolde," Beethoven's "Fidelio," Weber's "Euryanthe," and Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" will be given, with repetitions of each. The solo singers will be Frau Sucher and Frau Peschka-Leutner, Fräulein Malton, M. Brandt, Wiedermann, Schefsky, Hartmann, Vahsel, and Oehlmann; and Herren Winkelmann, Nachbaur, Wolff, Ehrke, Landau, Gura, Koegel, Hofmann, and Dr. Kraus. The business arrangements are in the hands of Herr Franke, by whom the Richter concerts were so ably managed; and with him is associated Herr Pollini, of Continental celebrity in this capacity. The scenery, costumes, and decorations—designed and executed in Germany—will be worthy of the occasion. The opening performance on May 18 will consist of "Lohengrin." Mr. Carl Armbruster has been appointed chorus director.

Great interest attaches to both the schemes now referred to; each having its distinctive features, and promising efficient renderings of German opera with all its national surroundings.

The Brighton Spring Exhibition of Water-colour Drawings was opened on the 19th inst. by the ex-Mayor, Mr. Alderman Smith. There were upwards of 600 works.

The returns of metropolitan pauperism last week show that during last week 50,619 indoor, and 40,167 outdoor paupers were relieved, making a total of 90,816, against 92,370 in the corresponding week of last year. There are decreases in all the districts except the eastern and southern. The number of vagrants relieved was 906.

An "infant" of the name of Robertson was last week sued in the Queen's Bench Division for a sum of over £600 for goods supplied within a period of about eighteen months. Among the articles sold were fifteen head-stalls, seventeen whips, and nine walking-sticks. Acting on the advice of the Judge, an arrangement was come to.

A rifle competition took place last week at Wormwood-scrubbs, when 156 winners of the gold and silver medals, given in the Queen's prize contest at Wimbledon, shot under the new Wimbledon regulations. The Champion badge in the Snider contest was won by Colour-Sergeant Gilbert, 3rd Middlesex, and the highest prize with the Martini-Henry by Sergeant-Instructor Gilder, 9th Middlesex.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

A very large circle of friends and acquaintances will hear with deep regret of the somewhat sudden death of Mr. Harry Hall, the well-known painter, which took place last Saturday. We were seldom at Newmarket without paying a visit to his studio, and, last spring, had the pleasure of seeing what is, perhaps, his best piece of work—a large picture of Robert the Devil, with Cannon up, the likenesses of both horse and jockey being marvellously successful. A self-taught artist in the first instance, Mr. Hall has for many years stood quite alone in his own particular line; indeed, he has enjoyed a complete monopoly of painting the portraits of famous winners, and his death has left a gap that it will be difficult indeed to fill up. He died at Newmarket, and was buried in the little cemetery at the "top of the town."

Tuesday was one of the most wretched days ever experienced even at Newmarket, but fortunately there was very little to see, and few, except those whose business kept them, and the most enthusiastic of backers, remained on the heath until the close of the proceedings. Goggles (9 st. 7 lb.) beat a large and very useful field for the First Welter Handicap, and showed that he must have had something in hand at Sandown Park last week. The Prince of Wales's Stakes fell to Muskelyne (7 st. 4 lb.) for the second year in succession, though it looked as though Incendiary (7 st. 5 lb.) would win until his defective wind stopped him on the final ascent. Of course the success of the French horse gave renewed confidence to the supporters of his stable companion, Executor, for the Two Thousand. This was really the only event of any importance on Wednesday's card, and, owing to the very open appearance of the race, there were no less than eighteen runners, the largest number that has taken part in the race since Pretender beat eighteen opponents in 1869. Gerald was an absentee, and the great feature of the betting prior to the start was the rush on Pursebearer. At the first attempt the lot were dispatched to an excellent start. The first to show in front was Southampton, who in the centre of the course settled down with a clear lead of Paragon and Quicklime, well up on the stand side being Marden, Shotover, Zeus, and Berwick, while on the right lay Pursebearer, Alban, Antarctic, and Laureate. Southampton brought them along at a good pace, and was followed by Quicklime, Paragon, Marden, Shotover, and Pursebearer, Sachem being next, to the Bushes. Here the latter was beaten, and directly after Executor being in trouble left Quicklime in command, his immediate followers descending the hill being Marden, Shotover, and Pursebearer. In the Abingdon dip Shotover, full of running, challenged, and soon having everything beaten, won in a canter by two lengths; half a length between the second and third; Pursebearer was fourth; Gareth fifth; Executor sixth; and Comte Alfred next; the last three were Laureate, Balil, and Zeus. Shotover, who is by Hermit from Stray Shot, is only the fourth filly that has won this race since it was established, more than seventy years ago. She performed badly in her three essays last season, but is evidently greatly improved, and, in the first blush of her victory, supplanted Bruce as favourite for the Derby. Porter has thus made a grand start as trainer to the Duke of Westminster; and, curiously enough, Cannon's only other victory in the Two Thousand was gained on a filly.

The Public Schools Racquet Challenge Cup was played for at Prince's last week, when representatives were sent from Eton, Harrow, Marlborough, Cheltenham, Winchester, Wellington, and Charterhouse. After some close and exciting matches in the preliminary rounds, in one of which the Marlborough pair showed unexpected form and were within an ace of beating Harrow, the final was left to the latter and Eton. R. H. Pemberton and A. C. Richards were the Etonians, and they were opposed by H. C. Crawley and C. D. Buxton. The contest proved a very good one; but, though Buxton was perhaps the best of the four players, he was not well backed up by his partner, and eventually the Eton pair secured the cup for the year by four games to two.

PROSPECTUS.
The Royal Assent to this undertaking in its present form having been obtained on the 11th of August last, the Directors now invite the co-operation of the public, and especially those interested in the locality, and in the three large Railway systems this line will link together—viz., the Great Western, the London and South-Western, and the London and North-Western—to carry this important work to a successful termination.

This Railway, about 14 miles in length, leaves the London and South-Western Railway westward of the Staines Station, crosses the Bath Road half a mile east of Colnbrook, and terminates by a junction with the Great Western Railway near the West Drayton Station.

With the exception of the Suburban Lines, there is no Railway communication between the Great Western and South-Western Railways nearer London than at Reading; the Staines and West Drayton Railway, therefore, will not only prove a great accommodation to the locality, but will also form the readiest means for the conveyance of through traffic.

This Railway will pass over a perfectly level country, and a glance at the Map accompanying the prospectus will show that it is destined, in conjunction with the Uxbridge and Rickmansworth Railway, authorised in the last Session of Parliament, to form an integral portion of a through North and South Line of communication.

The only contract which has been entered into by the Company is now the construction of the Line, the opening of it for public traffic, and the payment of all costs, charges, and expenses, Legal, Engineering, Parliamentary, incidental, and otherwise, up to the completion of the Line, for the total sum of £800,000. The Contractor, besides undertaking to pay interest at 5 per cent during construction on all sums accepted and paid in advance of calls, is bound to maintain the Line and Works for a period of six months after the same have been taken over by the Company.

The Line is to be completed within 18 months from the commencement of the Works.

The Great Western and South-Western Railways are authorised by Act of Parliament to work this Railway, and are prepared to give every facility for the construction of the Line.

Large returns may be looked for from the carriage of Coal and Bath Stone from West Drayton to Staines (the great proportion of the coal now consumed in and around Staines coming from South Wales), and this, with the various kinds of mill produce originating in the locality, together with passenger traffic in a district assuming a Metropolitan character, increase the prospect of a quick, satisfactory, and remunerative return.

Altogether, the Line will start under very favourable circumstances. It supplies a want long felt in the locality. It is within a short distance of the Metropolis. It is placed between two large Railway Systems, and offers to both a convenient means for interchange of traffic; and it occupies a position which points to its becoming a most important link in future Railway arrangements.

Copies of the Prospectus and Forms of Application for Shares can be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the Office of the Company.

The Contract and other documents may be seen at the Office of the Company.

Dated March 29, 1882.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.
In Two Epochs. By BLANCHARD JERROLD. With numerous illustrations. 2 vols., crown 8vo., cloth extra, 3s. 6d.
"The personal anecdotes are plentiful and to the point, and the illustrations are numerous and good. . . . Mr. Jerrold asks us to accept his volumes as 'memoirs pour servir'—as material towards a just judgment of the artist and the man. This is a modest, but they form an entertaining biography, not the less readable for not being strictly consecutive."—Standard.

JAMES PAYN'S NEW NOVEL.
FOR CASH ONLY: a Novel. By JAMES PAYN. 3 vols., crown 8vo., at every library.
"Mr. Pyn is lively as ever in his latest story. There are sketches of character most cleverly contrasted, drawn from a wide acquaintance with the world; while the sparkling dialogue is gemmed with good things, with apposite anecdotes, and with happy illustrations."—Times.

OIDA'S NEW NOVEL.
IN MAREMMA: a Novel. By OUIDA. 3 vols., crown 8vo., at every library.
"The new story by Ouida is very striking; the writer's touch is as vigorous and powerful as ever. There are strong and brilliant passages in this novel."—Academy.

SKETCHES OF THE ROYAL TAPESTRY MANUFACTORY AT WINDSOR.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE ROYAL WINDSOR TAPESTRY MANUFACTORY.

In July, 1877, an important event in the progress of English art-manufactures and of revived taste in this country took place in the Royal borough of Windsor. This was the inauguration, at the Manor Lodge, Old Windsor, under the immediate patronage of her Majesty the Queen, and of their Royal Highnesses Prince Leopold, Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, and Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, of a factory of tapestry, which promises to renew the ancient charms and glories of that historic method of household decoration. It is a fact just now of more than usual interest, that his Royal Highness Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, was the author of the suggestion that an establishment of this kind should be started in England. Some years ago, when the Prince was residing at Boyton Manor, in Wiltshire, he was waited upon, in the ordinary course of business, by Mr. H. Henry, then connected with the firm of Messrs. Gillow and Co., of Oxford-street, decorators and manufacturers of ornamental furniture. His Royal Highness entered frankly into conversation with Mr. Henry upon matters of decorative art, and showed him a fine specimen of old tapestry which was hanging in the hall. "Ah, they don't make tapestry now," remarked the Prince. "Only at Gobelins and Aubusson," replied Mr. Henry. "Why don't they make it in England?" asked his Royal Highness; "why don't you start a manufactory?" Mr. Henry then said that it ought to be a national concern, and that he believed, if the Prince would give it his public support, a committee might be organised to carry out the undertaking. He was thereupon desired by the Prince to draw up a report upon the project, with a list of the proposed committee, which his Royal Highness would submit to the Queen. Mr. Henry, within two or three months, had performed this task successfully, engaging the aid and favourable countenance of several accomplished friends of art; Lord Ronald Gower, who became honorary secretary, the Duke of Westminster, the Duke of Leinster, and the Marquis of Bute; Louise, Marchioness of Waterford, and other ladies of rank; Sir Richard Wallace, and Sir P. Cunliffe Owen, Director of the South Kensington Museum. He also procured from M. Brignolas, then of the French tapestry factory at Aubusson, a piece of work, 12 ft. by 9 ft. in size, reproducing a hunting scene painted by Mr. Henry on rough canvas, to imitate the effect of old tapestry. This was sent, with Mr. Henry's report, to her Majesty at Balmoral. The Royal approval was at once granted, and Mr. Henry and Lord Ronald Gower lost no time in putting the scheme into execution. M. Brignolas was engaged as manager of the workshops, and a number of skilful hands, Frenchmen and Frenchwomen, came over with him to instruct the English apprentices in this almost forgotten art, which at a former time was practised in England, a tapestry-weaving establishment having been founded at Mortlake by King Charles I. The production of tapestry by needlework, as our readers are probably aware, was a favourite pursuit of English ladies in much earlier times, and down to the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Mr. Henry, the director of this institution, is a decorative artist of high talent and repute, who was the designer of the interior ornamentation of the grand Midland Railway Hotel, St. Pancras, of the Carlton Club, of the Prince of Wales's Pavilion at the late Paris Exhibition, and of several of the richest and finest new houses in London. The artist principally employed in designing cartoons for the Windsor tapestry is Mr. T. W. Hay; but other artists, the late Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A., and Mrs. Ward, Mr. J. E. Hodgson, R.A., Mr. Herbert Bone, Mr. John O'Connor, M. Monblond, and M. Gerard, have contributed designs; and a few sketches by Louise, Marchioness of Waterford, enlarged by Mrs. E. M. Ward, have been made available for this purpose. An exhibition of the products of this beautiful industry was opened at Windsor last year in the Townhall, and was visited by numbers of people; there was an exhibition also at the Bassano Galleries in Old Bond-street; and a collection of these fabrics was much admired in the last Paris Exhibition.

The Royal Tapestry Manufactory at Windsor, which has been frequently visited by the Queen and most of the Royal family, has now a permanent abode in a handsome building, of Queen Anne architecture, designed by Mr. Walter Lyon, architect, and erected on land granted by the Crown near the Albert Bridge. We give some illustrations of the interior, of the looms and other appliances, and of the working hands. The processes of dyeing the woollen thread, of winding it, of preparing the warp for the loom, and of weaving, are shown in these sketches, to which is added that of women repairing a piece of old tapestry by hand needlework. Admission is liberally granted, on Saturdays, to inspect the Royal Windsor Tapestry Manufactory. The only difference between the looms used at Windsor and those at the Gobelins Tapestry Manufactory, near Paris, seems to be in their position. The former are horizontal, this arrangement being technically called "low warp," or basse lisse, as the French say, whereas those in use at Gobelins are on the haute lisse system, in which the warp stands up perpendicular to the worker. In both instances, the coloured cartoon to be copied is placed on the far side of the warp, so that the weaver can, at any moment, by putting aside the threads of the warp, look through and see the design which is to be imitated by the woven fabric. The apparatus for winding the threads, which are of many different hues and shades for the weft, and the operation of preparing and laying down the warp in the loom, appear tolerably simple. In the actual weaving, which is rather a slow kind of work, the white horizontal threads of the warp, one by one, are lifted with the left hand, or by the treadle action, while the reels of coloured threads for the pattern are passed, with the right hand, between the threads of the warp; so that it takes several days' labour to weave a square foot of any elaborate pattern. A peculiarity of the Windsor manufacture is that every thread used consists of a combination of two shades of the colour, one not so bright as the other, to tone down any glaring or staring effect. All the dyeing of the threads is done on the premises, and not less than five thousand different shades are in use. The fineness and nicety of perception required for this work can only be expected in those naturally gifted with a quick and sure eye for colour, improved by training through long years of practice.

We have also engraved the design of a cartoon drawn by Mr. J. E. Hodgson, R.A., representing "The Men of Kent Marching in Front of the Army of Harold," which was copied at the Royal Windsor Tapestry Manufactory, as one of four very large panels of tapestry made for Mr. H. A. Brasse, M.P. Another, designed by the same artist, depicted the "Siege of Rochester Castle and the Burning of Rochester Bridge," in the War of the Barons; and there was one by the late Mr. E. M. Ward, R.A., representing the fight between the Britons under Vortigern and the Saxons of Hengist and Horsa, at Aylesford, on the Medway, about the six hundredth year of the Christian era. Mr. Herbert Bone's five Cartoons of subjects from Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," worked in fine Windsor tapestry for Mr. Coleridge Kennard, were much admired in the Exhibition of last year.

FINE ARTS.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS.

The present exhibition of this society seems to be, on the whole, a good one, although there are few works of any exceptional excellence. This society is formed, in much larger proportions than the Institute, of artists who are mainly painters in water colours; hence its strength is more regularly put en évidence, and on this occasion there are no absentees of importance, except Mr. Alma Tadema and two or three others. Since the last exhibition, several new Associates have been elected, and, although some of these are but little known, the society appears to have made no mistake in their selection.

Among these, the painter whose reputation is of longest standing is R. Beavis, who has seceded from the Institute. Of his two contributions we prefer, for its richer colouring and more picturesque treatment, the "Skirts of the Forest of Fontainebleau—Timber Clearing" (32). C. Gregory, like the last, has made his mark in oil-painting, though more recently. He is seen to most advantage in a drawing (77), full of colour and sufficiently broad in effect, of a girl with two children on the margin of a stream with ducks. Miss Constance Phillott's "Electra" (205) shows admirable foreshortening in the head, and is carefully and skilfully elaborated. S. J. Hodson proves himself a meritorious painter of figures in combination with architecture, particularly in "Der Gänsemarkt, Nurnburg" (60): the foreground is effective, the distance duly subordinated by aerial perspective. Mr. J. Jessop Hardwick, a painter of still-life, is variously represented: but, perhaps, the severest test of his skill is afforded in the simple "Bank of Primroses" (128), which, in its brilliant colouring and balance of exactitude and freedom, evinces that he is a not unworthy successor of William Hunt.

Several other artists elected recently, or comparatively recently, are making sure if not rapid progress, and their merit is not less estimable because it is modestly displayed. In this category may be classed G. Du Maurier—whose "La Belle Distracte" (264) is a decided advance in point of colour; and Norman Tayler, among the figure-painters. Among the landscapists, W. Pilsbury—all of whose little bits of rural scenery have minutely conscientious and charming fidelity; W. Eyre Walker—whose "Down to the Sea: a scene in North Wales" (72) strikes a note of greater strength; and W. M. Hale—who, by-the-way, is already promoted to full membership. C. Rigby, besides sending several landscapes, has tried his hand with success in a small single-figure subject, "The First Letter Home" (220). Mrs. Angell, in her flower-pieces, is more vivid in effect and richer in colouring than ever. But of all the newer accessions to the society, none is making head and establishing a speciality more surely than H. M. Marshall in his town views. Mr. Marshall has had the good taste to perceive that much-abused London presents under various conditions of weather, and with occasional gleams of sunlight irradiating its mysterious gradations of fog and smoke, inexhaustible material for artistic representation. But it requires rare justness of observation to render the effects to which we allude, and so faithfully as this artist has done in "Westminster—Evening after Rain" (91), and other works. E. Buckman's party of sailors and soldiers drinking "The Toast of the Army and Navy" (164) at a table before an inn, does not certainly err in the direction of false refinement and mock sentiment, but it is more harmonious and stronger in colour than any preceding work by the artist that we remember. We would also mention in this connection A. Hopkins's spirited "All Hands to the Capstan" (170), E. F. Brewtnall's "The Visit to the Witch" (158)—rather stagey, perhaps, but not a little artistic in colour; "The Knitting Lesson" (151), by R. Barnes; and "A North Sea Pilot" (80), by A. H. Marsh. Mrs. Allingham dispels any impression that might have been formed that she was inclining to self-repetition in her drawing of a young mother officiating at "The Children's Tea" (248), in a cozy country parlour flooded with light from a large casement. This is the nearest approach the accomplished artist has made to Frederick Walker. The execution is dainty in the extreme; the effect of light admirably rendered. We have a high level of manly art, broad and truthful, grasping the whole relations of the subject in hand, in Mr. Thorne White's several contributions, especially "The Beach at Hastings" (186), with fishermen engaged over the night's take in the foreground, with the picturesque adjuncts of their village in the middle distance, and the cliffs beyond veiled by the silvery early morning mist.

It is time, however, to turn to the works of the members whose reputations have generally been longer associated with this gallery. Happily, their several styles are so well known that little critical comment is necessary, otherwise our space would not suffice to analyse all that is noteworthy. The worthy President sends one of the largest drawings he has ever exhibited, "The Head of the Procession" (105), a sixteenth-century cavalcade of gaily-caparisoned horses, and sumptuously costumed figures bearing flags and banners. The composition is almost too exuberant; the colouring almost too gorgeous—at least, as regards the strong oppositions of red and blue in the flags; yet we know no living painter from whom we could expect so splendid a piece of decoration in water colours. There are mementoes of departed members in one of S. Palmer's Miltonic illustrations (61)—impressive, but strongly marked with his mannerism; and two examples of E. Duncan. There are several contributions by Carl Haag, including three gems on the screens, all of them distinguished by his vigour of effect, rich colouring, and vivid realisation of picturesque Oriental life. Birker Foster contributes two important drawings, "Turnberry Castle, Ayrshire" (116), and "The Watering Place," the latter especially marked by his better characteristics. The public will know also exactly what to expect when we say that G. Fripp is represented in several small drawings, A. Fripp in a view of Lulworth (96), A. W. Hunt in views of Durham, of which "Bramwell Gate Bridge" (120) is, perhaps, the most Turneresque; W. C. T. Dobson in a child's head (21); E. A. Goodall in a panoramic view of "The Principal Buildings of Venice" (83), under early morning effect; Basil Bradley in "Buried in the Snow" (123), with St. Bernard dogs; S. Reid in a striking drawing of the "High Altar of St. Paul's, Antwerp" (70), and others smaller but not less effective; C. E. Johnson in female figures, with landscape accessories; H. Wallis in further illustrations of "The Merchant of Venice"—which seem to us less acceptable dramatically considered than for their Venetian colouring; F. Powell in small seapieces, which sometimes reconcile the realistic with the poetic; P. Boyce in still smaller landscapes, wholly realistic; A. Goodwin also in landscapes, usually marked by poetic intention, though occasionally forced in the means, as in "The Invading Army" (71); and A. Glennie in Italian scenes. H. B. Willis's animal-pieces, though small, are of choice quality, and he is not less happy with cart horses, unharnessed on "The Day of Rest" (133), than with the more familiar cattle-pieces. The following deserve special mention also:—Mr. H. Moore's "Break in the Storm" (9)—the ghastly foaming wrath of the sea lashed by a storm revealed by a sudden sunburst; Mr. O. W. Brierly's picture of the "General Ship" of a squadron of the Spanish Armada taken to Torbay by Drake (45), one of this artist's highly interesting series of illustrations of England's naval glories in the Elizabethan era; and A. P. Newton's large and striking drawing (73) of a mountain on the summit of which linger the last rays of the setting sun. Lastly, there is a "Head of a Knight" (93), by the recently-elected honorary member, Adolph Menzel, the distinguished German illustrator, which is finely drawn and modelled, but sullied in colouring. The society has this year issued a catalogue with illustrations, some of which are excellent.

"CHRIST BEFORE PILATE"

This gigantic work, by Michael Munkacsy, the Hungarian painter, but who has worked in Paris in recent years, is now being exhibited at the Conduit-street gallery, and will doubtless attract much more attention than the picture by the same artist of "Milton Dictating to his Daughters," which was shown in Bond-street two years back. The present work is, at least technically, a great advance: rich transparent and harmonious masses of bituminous brown, with golden lights, such as yielded the gem-like though more forced sparkle of "The Visit to Baby," and other of the painter's recent works in genre, take the place of the black and rather opaque shadows of the Milton picture; while the handling has all, and more than all, the masterly freedom and foregone decision by which alone so rich an inner glow of colour, clear even when profoundly deep, can be preserved. Monsieur Munkacsy has evidently emulated Rembrandt in his tonality; as in the subordination to it of the subdued reds and yellows and the sparing use of blue; but his gradations are less subtle, and he has not so cunningly focussed his principal figures in light as the great Dutch master would have done. Munkacsy's work is also realistic much in the sense that Rembrandt's was so. He has taken most of his models from the life about him, and thought little more of probable historical accuracy in the accessories than would the Dutchman. But here the comparison ends. Munkacsy is not a poetic realist, which, contradictory as the epithet may seem, Rembrandt was. No glamour of imagination glimmers through his work. The disproportions of the figures are greater. The figure of Christ, for example, is too tall, compared with that of the nearer Roman legionary; while both are too small for the more distant colossus, Pilate. Then, the draughtsmanship and modelling are defective throughout; the figures are disjointed; the anatomy is wrong; the faces and limbs are structurally incongruous. The composition, however, is very intelligent; it admirably subserves the telling of the story. Pilate, in toga and with bullet-head, like the late Roman busts (the best-conceived character and best-selected type in the picture), sits on the spectator's right, before the apsed recess of a basilica or judgment-hall, with knit brows, clamped lips, and perplexed expression, telling off the points of the accusation on his fingers. About him are Jewish priests and magnates, one of whom, risen to his feet, denounces the accused. Christ, in white robes, stands near the centre of the composition, with head turned in profile towards Pilate, and expression too assertive of his innocence for the prescient Godhead, who would foresee that a mere look of remonstrance or appeal would be unavailing. The profile is strongly accented, and presents no trace of the traditional type. The conception of Jesus is, indeed, purely "secular," and is almost as devoid of indicated reverence for religious sentiment as for tradition. Behind are the Jewish rabble, one of them, with raised arms, howling for the release of Barabbas. They are restrained by a legionary who levels his spear as a barrier.

We have insisted upon the great, rare, and, relatively to our own time, original, though limited technical merits of the picture, because they form its highest claim to attention. After these it is of striking interest dramatically considered— that is, as a strong and nervous presentment of a case of false accusation against some ordinary mortal—without sensational clap-trap or Academical conventionality, such as Gustave Doré might have indulged in. To these technical merits the picture doubtless owed much of its success in Paris, Vienna, and Pesth. These sufficed to a public either indifferent to the subject otherwise than as a medium for pictorial display; or tolerant of a realism that is nearly as conventional as the sixteenth and seventeenth century treatment of Scriptural subjects in Catholic Europe. But in the England of to-day, with its inquiring spirit and Protestantism, the technicalities of the picture will be precisely the least appreciated of its qualities; and its conception will be challenged by many on several grounds. The picture will neither please the pious nor the poetic, for it has little religious sentiment or penetrative imagination. And still less will it satisfy the biblical archaeologist and ethnologist after all that Holman Hunt, Herbert, and Charles Verlat, of Antwerp, and others, have done in order to realise scientifically the probably actual aspect that Scriptural events presented when they occurred. Verlat painted a large picture nearly identical in subject with this—the "Nous voulons Barabbas!" which was awarded a gold medal in the great Paris Exhibition of '78. But to paint this picture, and others of the series to which it belongs, he threw aside the traditions of the Belgian school, and, like Holman Hunt, spent years in Palestine painting the sunlight and the Jews among its inhabitants as he saw it and them. Of course, Scriptural events may be treated poetically in such a way as to more than condone for an entire neglect of literal accuracy. But Mr. Munkacsy's picture, splendid as it is as a technical achievement, fails, we repeat, of elevated imagination on the one hand, while, on the other, its realism is unintelligent and conventional.

An important etching of the picture is being executed by Mr. Waltner, and will be published by Messrs. Agnew.

UNITED ARTS GALLERY.

The summer exhibition at this gallery, which consists, as usual, almost exclusively of works by foreign artists, contains some examples of painters of distinction, together with many by men of less mark, and but little known in this country. The pressure on our space is too great to notice the collection in detail, at least at present. It must suffice to say that among the more noteworthy pictures are two by Bastien Lepage, "Pauvre Fauvette" and "Le Petite Coquette;" another by J. Jimenez Aranda, the "Sermon outside Seville Cathedral;" several by L. Welden Hawkins, an English artist, who hitherto has painted and exhibited in Paris; incidents of child-life by T. Lobrichon; works by Girardet, Sell, Szerner, and others.

M. de Neuville's picture "The Cemetery of St. Privat," one of the artist's latest and most remarkable works, will be on view on and after Monday next, at Messrs. Dowdeswell's gallery, New Bond-street.

An important recently-finished picture by Rosa Bonheur, called the "Lion at Home," representing a noble lion, his mate, and three cubs in their native forest, is on view at Mr. Lefevre's, preliminary to its being engraved.

At Messrs. Mendoza's Gallery, in Duke-street, St. James's, there is a collection of pictures by living and deceased painters of English and foreign schools. It includes works by J. R. Herbert, R.A.; Sydney Cooper, R.A.; R. Ansdell, R.A.; and, among deceased artists, Creswick, Calloot, and David Roberts.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

HISTORY OF CUSTOMS AND BELIEFS.

Mr. Edward B. Tylor, D.C.L., F.R.S., gave the first of a course of four lectures on Tuesday, the 18th inst. After commenting on the difficulties of the study of the laws of human conduct, he noticed four methods of pursuing it—the speculative or philosophical (really guessing), the historical, the geographical, and the inferential. With regard to the first of these methods, he criticised Mr. Herbert Spencer's mode of treatment of various customs in his valuable work on "Ceremonial Institutions," and demonstrated its fallacy in regard to the origin of various customs. Dr. Tylor explained that the habit in Japan of carrying two swords was rather utilitarian than as trophies of victory, and exhibited specimens; that the practice of shaking hands had rather a social than a ceremonial derivation; and he pointed out the distinction, both in ancient and modern times, between cutting and tearing the flesh as signs of mourning for dead relatives, and the practice of tattooing for personal ornament or for emblems of rank, or even of disgrace, as in the case of deserters, practiced in this country till 1871. He then noticed the probably true cause of the differing colours used for mourning by various nations. As an example of the employment of the historical method, he selected the custom of leading a horse at the funeral of a deceased warrior, referring specially to the case of the Duke of Wellington's charger, and traced the custom as far back as the time of Harold, stating that in some cases two or more horses were so led. Quoting Dugdale, he stated that these animals were most probably mortuaries, or corpse gifts, to the Church, to obtain prayers for the departed soul. Palfreys were led at the funerals of ladies. In pre-Christian times the horse was killed and burnt, with the corpse, in order that its ghost might carry its ghostly rider in the land of the shades. Dr. Tylor concluded with some comments on the practice of playing the flute by one nostril in Siam, India, and Fiji.

THE CHEMISTRY OF THE METALS.

Professor Dewar, M.A., F.R.S., gave the first of a course of eight lectures on Thursday, the 20th inst. He began by considering the classification of the metallic elements (about sixty-three or sixty-four) according to their chemical and physical properties. After noticing the older classification, such as noble, base, alkaline, and earth-metals, he referred to the new arrangement of the metals according to their atomic weights propounded by Mendeleeff, an ingenious Russian chemist, exhibited in a series of diagrams, from which a law of periodicity had been evolved, and by the study of which much light has been thrown on the chemical and physical relations of these bodies. He next explained and illustrated the formation and properties of salts produced by the combination of an acid and an alkali (the delicate process termed neutralisation), followed by crystallisation. He then considered the chemical principles involved in the separation of the metals, particularly dilating on the process termed reduction from their condition as oxides, sulphides, and carbonates by the agency of hydrogen in water or steam, solid carbon, and carbonic oxide. After alluding to the great number of metallic salts, the Professor commented on the great importance of ascertaining their stability as indicating the amount of energy evolved in their formation, now expressed in thermal and electrical units.

THE WORK OF H. STE. CLAIRE DEVILLE, HON. M.R.I.

Professor Dewar gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, the 21st inst. After alluding to the discourse describing Deville's discoveries relating to aluminium by the Rev. John Barlow on March 14, 1856, and on his researches relating to platinum, &c., by Professor Faraday on Feb. 22, 1861, Professor Dewar commented on the main features of the life-work of the great French chemist. Deville was born at St. Thomas's, in the West Indies, and educated in France, early devoting himself to chemistry, under Dumas, with great success. As Professor, he was soon removed from Besançon to the Ecole Normale, at Paris, where he died July 1, 1881. His researches relating to chemical substitution having been noticed, experimental illustrations were given of Deville's method of isolating aluminium from the earth alumina by means of sodium, and of his production of both of those previously rare and expensive metals in great quantities. Some aluminium bronze, an alloy of copper and aluminium, was produced by the electric arc in lime crucibles before the audience. In these researches Deville was liberally supported by the late Emperor Napoleon III. His methods of isolating the metals boron and silicon were next illustrated. This was followed by an account of his method of producing high temperatures, by improvements of the oxy-hydrogen blow-pipe, and its employment in the metallurgy of platinum, and other rare metals, in which he was greatly aided by the firm of Johnson and Matthey, of London, of whose work many valuable specimens were exhibited. Ultimately hundreds of pounds of platinum were melted as easily as lead. Starting with the discovery of Grove, that water can be decomposed by heat alone, Professor Dewar described and illustrated Deville's researches relating to dissociation—viz., the decomposition of compounds by simultaneous heat and pressure, and their analogous behaviour to elementary bodies, which was demonstrated by a series of interesting experiments.

HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF POLITICS—ARISTOTLE.

Mr. Frederick Pollock, M.A., LL.D., gave the first of a course of four lectures on Saturday last, the 22nd inst. In his opening remarks he stated that Aristotle has been generally recognised as the founder of political science, which had as much right to its position in the circle of human knowledge as that of morals, as being really more practical and influential: the "Declaration of the Rights of Man" by the French Assembly being adduced as an instance. Political science is needful also for the criticism of theories and projects. Mr. Pollock then commented on the constitution of the Greek States, especially of Athens. Pericles was its first statesman, and, perhaps, the greatest who ever lived. Under his rule man's faculties were more greatly developed than elsewhere, by the free and generous education of a refined life. The conception of the State was a very living reality to the Athenians, as is shown in the life of Socrates, in whose recorded conversations we find a roughly-sketched classification of the forms of government—viz., Royalty degenerating into tyranny, aristocracy leading to plutocracy and democracy. This idea was afterwards worked out by Plato, who defined government to be a special art to be exercised only by competent persons, duly qualified by discipline. Plato's own conceptions were fanciful, and impracticable, as shown by his "Republic," which cannot be considered as a valuable contribution to political science. Aristotle, in his politics, struck out a new path, and separated ethics from politics. He begins with the actual conditions of human society and the formation of government. He asserts that a State is a community existing for some benefit to its members, and resembles a household or family, to which command and order are essential for safety. This is the true nucleus of the State. Aristotle's masterly view of the subject was expressed in his axiom, that man is born to be a citizen.

THE CHURCH.

PREFEMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.

Bumstead, James Henry, Curate of Christ Church, Clodwick, Oldham, to be Vicar of Hambledon, Poulton-le-Fylde.
 Connor, M. Mitchell, late Curate of Lewisham; Vicar of West Bromwich.
 Goddard, Francis, Vicar of Hillmorton, Wilts; Prebendary of Chisenbury and Cheete, in Salisbury Cathedral.
 Hall, W., Curate of Holy Trinity, Littleborough; Curate-in-Charge of Bugsworth, Derbyshire.
 Jones-Langston, Charles, Rector of Sevington; Vicar of Beoley.
 Olive, L. Wallace; Curate of Burton Agnes.
 Osmann, G. C.; Vicar of St. Matthew's, Sheffield.
 Partridge, Canon, Rector of Rothsay, Diocese of Fredericton; Rector of St. George's, Halifax, Nova Scotia.
 Pomeroy, Harrison Albert, late Curate of Wyke; Curate of St. Peter's, Worcester-with-Whittington.
 Terry, Stephen; Rector of Lasham.
 Walter, W. Hanson, Rector of St. Mary-le-Bow, Durham; Chaplain to the High Sheriff of Durham.
 Wetherall, Charles Maunsell; Rector of Hambledon, Bucks.
 Wood, A., Curate of Ponton; Rector of Great Ponton.—Guardian.

The Sunday evening services at Exeter Cathedral are to be suspended during the summer months.

A new church is about to be erected for the parish of St. Leonard, Exeter, at a cost of £4000, towards which a brother of the present Rector has contributed £1500.

St. Matthew's, Wolverhampton, of which the Rev. J. E. Gladstone is Vicar, was reopened recently by the Bishop of Lichfield.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has fixed Tuesday, May 30, for the annual meeting on behalf of the Irish Church Sustentation Fund, which will be held at Lambeth Palace.

The Archbishop of Canterbury presided at the annual meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in St. James's Hall yesterday.

The Bishop of Salisbury on Wednesday week opened the second session of his fourth Diocesan Synod, in the great Chapter-house. Three hundred clerical and lay members attended.

On Monday the Archbishop of York consecrated the new Church of St. Thomas, at Hull, and afterwards opened the new wing of the Hull Seamen's and General Orphan Asylum at Spring Bank.

Under the patronage of the Duke of Devonshire and the Countess of Shrewsbury, a bazaar was held during the last three days of Easter week at Derby, in behalf of the building fund for the schools of St. Luke's Church, in that town.

The Caxton memorial window in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, will be unveiled, and a sermon preached on behalf of the Printers' Corporation by the Rev. Canon Farrar, to-morrow.

Mr. Cecil Raikes, M.P., presided at the annual meeting of the Church of England Young Men's Society, held in the Cannon-street Hotel, on Tuesday week. The Ven. J. Richardson, Archdeacon of Southwark, gave a special address.

In aid of the fund for providing a new school and mission-room for St. Matthew's, Stonehouse, a bazaar will be held next month under the patronage of the Earl of Mount-Edgcombe, the Ladies Ernestine, Albertha, and Edith Edgcombe, and the Hon. Mrs. Edgcombe.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has consented to become a patron of the Society for Preserving the Memorials of the Dead. The inaugural meeting will be held at the rooms of the Society of Arts, John-street, Adelphi, on Wednesday, May 10, when the chair will be taken by Lord Carnarvon.

The Ven. Archdeacon Norris, Archdeacon of Bristol, delivered his primary visitation charge in that city on Tuesday week, and announced that, in order to thoroughly visit his archdeaconry, he had resigned the important vicarage of St. Mary, Redcliffe.

An attempt is being made to raise a fund for the support of a Bishop Suffragan of St. Albans. The sum sought to be raised is a capital sufficient to create an income of £1000 per annum. The appointment of the Bishop Suffragan is rendered desirable by the failing eyesight of the Bishop of St. Albans.

The Mayor of Gloucester recently laid the foundation-stone of a memorial church to Robert Raikes, the founder of Sunday schools. The Bishop of the diocese and other dignitaries were present. The church is to accommodate nearly a thousand worshippers.

An effective Munich window of two lights, representing "Christ Meeting the Women on the Way to Calvary" and the "Angel at the Tomb," has been placed by Messrs. Mayer and Co. in the parish church of Feliskirk, Yorkshire. It is in memory of Mr. Edward Walker, of Sutton Hall, Thirsk.

The Church of St. Mary, Newton Solney—one of the most interesting of Derbyshire churches—was recently reopened, after a judicious restoration costing about £3700, the greater part of which has been borne by Mr. R. Ratcliff, patron of the living. The Bishop of Lichfield conducted the services.

A bazaar was lately held at Ilkeston, under the patronage of Lady Lucy Drury-Lowe, Sir Henry and Lady Wilmot, Lieutenant-Colonel Newdigate, J.P., and other ladies and gentlemen, in aid of the fund for building a Church Institute for the Ilkeston Church Mutual Improvement Society.

The annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Bishop of London's Fund was held at Willis's Rooms on Wednesday. The Bishop of London took the chair. The total receipts of the fund in 1881 were £17,381, of which £15,384 arose from donations and subscriptions.

The Countess of Sefton opened a bazaar (an old English fair and a gipsy encampment) on Tuesday in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, to be continued through the week, towards extinguishing the debt on the parish church of St. Cuthbert, Robson-street, Everton.

An elaborate fancy fair, arranged as a Chinese city, is being held in Derby in aid of the various parochial institutions connected with the Church of the Holy Trinity, Derby. The Lord Lieutenant and High Sheriff of the county, the members for the borough and for South Derbyshire, are among the patrons of the undertaking.

After consecrating a new church at Leckhampton recently, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol was entertained to luncheon and his Lordship's health proposed by the Vicar, who made special reference to the scholarly and valuable services rendered by the Bishop as president of the New Testament Revision Committee. In reply his Lordship said if the revised version had the effect of bringing God's Word more closely to the English-speaking people—whatever its other results might be—the dearest and highest hopes of the revision would be attained. Speaking upon Church work, his Lordship incidentally mentioned that during his nineteen years' episcopate £850,000 has been spent upon church and school buildings in his diocese.

Yesterday week the Lord Mayor was entertained by the Master and Wardens of the Sadlers' Company at their hall, in Cheapside. A large number of distinguished guests were invited to meet his Lordship.

OBITUARY.

THE COUNTESS OF WEMYSS AND MARCH.

The Right Hon. Louisa, Countess of Wemyss and March, died on the 16th inst., at Gosford, near Haddington, in her eighty-fourth year. Her Ladyship was the third daughter of Richard, second Earl of Lucan, by Lady Elizabeth Belasyse, his wife, third daughter and coheir of Henry, last Earl of Fauconberg, and was sister of the present General the Earl of Lucan, G.C.B. She was married in 1817 to Francis Earl Wemyss and March, and had five sons and two daughters, of whom the eldest son is Lord Elcho, M.P.

MR. MACDONOGH, Q.C.

Mr. Francis Macdonogh, Q.C., the well-known advocate, died at Rutland-square, Dublin, on the 18th inst., aged seventy-seven. He was a most astute lawyer, and the last survivor of a group of distinguished men who held prominent place at the Irish Bar for more than a generation. His practice was very extensive, including nearly all the leading cases of his time; latterly the more conspicuous were the Longford and Purdon and the Bagot will cases, and the Blackwater fishery contest. He was engaged also in the recent State trials in Dublin, as counsel for Mr. Parnell. For a time Mr. Macdonogh represented Sligo in Parliament, but was afterwards defeated by Mr. Serjeant Armstrong. The election was, however, annulled on account of bribery, and the borough disfranchised. Mr. Macdonogh was fifty-three years at the Bar.

COLONEL J. T. CLIFTON.

Colonel John Talbot Clifton, formerly M.P. for North Lancashire, died on the 16th inst., on his yacht, at Algiers. He was born March 5, 1819, the eldest son of Thomas Clifton, of Clifton and Lytham, by Hetty, his wife, daughter of Peregrine Treves, Postmaster-General of Calcutta, and widow of David Campbell, of Kildalloig, Argyllshire. He received his education at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1839 entered the 1st Life Guards; subsequently he became Colonel of the 1st Lancashire Militia. He was a Magistrate for Leicestershire and Rutlandshire, and J.P. and D.L. for Lancashire, for which county he served as High Sheriff in 1853. From 1844 to 1847 he represented the northern division of the same county in Parliament. He married, April 22, 1844, Lady Eleanor Cecily Lowther, sister of Henry, third Earl of Lonsdale, and had an only son, Thomas Henry Clifton, also M.P. for North Lancashire, who died March 31, 1880. The Cliftons of Clifton and Lytham possess great landed estates, and can deduce their pedigree from the time of the Conqueror. There still remains amongst the family muniments a deed of gift, temp. William Rufus, by which Sir William de Clifton granted his Manors of Clifton and Salwick to his son, Sir William, on his marriage. One of the late Colonel Clifton's brothers has recently been created Lord Donington, and his Lordship's son has succeeded, in right of his mother, to the Scottish earldom of Loudoun, and the English baronies of Bortreaux, Hungerford, De Moleyns, and Hastings.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Portraits and memoirs of the late Mr. Darwin, Sir. H. Cole, Mr. S. Gurney, and Mr. E. Duncan are given in another page.

Mr. George Grant Francis, F.S.A., suddenly, on the 22nd inst., at Swansea, from paralysis, at the age of sixty-eight.

The Ven. W. B. Ady, Archdeacon of Colchester and Rector of Little Beddow, on the 21st inst., at the age of sixty-five.

Mr. Thomas Grieve, the well-known scene-painter, in his eighty-second year.

Mr. Harry Hall, the celebrated painter of horses, on the 22nd inst., from an attack of paralysis.

Mr. Charles Carpenter, J.P. for Sussex and Cornwall, on the 14th inst., at Brighton, aged eighty-four.

Major-General Charles Jackson, Bengal Army, on the 14th inst., in his sixtieth year.

The Countess of Minto, at Bournemouth, on the 21st inst. She was the daughter General Sir Thomas Hlop, and married, in 1844, her cousin, the present Earl of Minto.

The Rev. Thomas Harding Newman, D.D., many years Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, at Nelves, Hornchurch, near Romford, Essex, on the 21st inst.

The Rev. Dr. Gervase Smith, an ex-President of the Wesleyan Conference, on the 22nd inst. He was one of the most popular preachers and lecturers in the Wesleyan body.

The Rev. Haviland De Saumarez, formerly Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford, and Rector of St. Peter's, Northampton-with-Upton. He was son of Mr. Thomas De Saumarez, of Samaurez Manor, Guernsey.

Lady Macleod (Emily Maria Douglas), widow of Major-General Sir John Chetham Macleod, K.C.B., and daughter of Mr. Abercromby Dick, Bengal Civil Service, on the 10th inst., at Colombo.

Mr. William McKerrell, of Hill House, Ayrshire, J.P., at his residence, 31, Norfolk-square, Hyde Park, on the 11th inst., aged eighty-six. He was the representative of a very old Ayrshire family, and is now succeeded by the next male heir, Robert Mure McKerrell, eldest son of the late Mr. Robert McKerrell, by Emily Pauline, his wife, daughter of General Sir William Staveley, K.C.B.

The Rev. Frederic Francis Edwardes, M.A., B.D., on the 15th inst., at Gileston Manor, Cowbridge, Glamorgan. He was born Feb. 5, 1801, the only son of the Rev. John Edwardes, M.A. (a scion of the old Welsh family of Edwardes of Rhyd-y-Gôrs), and Margaret, his wife, daughter and heiress of the Rev. William Willis, of Gileston Manor. He married, in 1850, Susanna Mary, daughter of Mr. J. Bevan, of Cowbridge.

The Right Hon. Louisa Pennel, Dowager Lady Abercromby, in Chapel-street, Belgrave-square, on the 20th inst. Her Ladyship was the daughter of the Hon. John Hay Forbes, Lord Medwyn, a Lord of Session and Justiciary in Scotland; and was married, April 3, 1832, to George Ralph, third Lord Abercromby, by whom she was mother of the present Lord Abercromby, of the Countess of Glasgow, and of the Hon. John Abercromby and the Hon. Ralph Abercromby.

Mr. Augustus Arthur Vansittart, M.A., barrister-at-law, on the 17th inst., at Cambridge. He was the second son of General George Henry Vansittart, by Ann Mary, his wife, daughter of Mr. Thomas Copson, and was brother of Mr. Vansittart, of Bisham Abbey, Berks, formerly M.P. for that county. He married, in 1857, the Hon. Rachel Fanny, daughter of George, late Lord Boston. Mr. Vansittart was a distinguished scholar, and a great benefactor to his University, where he was long Auditor of Trinity College.

Mr. Justice Kay on the 20th inst. gave judgment in the action brought by Mr. C. H. Roberts against the Corporation of London. Without calling upon the counsel for the defendants, his Lordship held that the Corporation possessed the power to modify the form of the appointment from time to time, and that in requiring the annual election of the Remembrancer it had acted within its rights. The action was therefore dismissed, with costs.

THE LATE MR. C. R. DARWIN, F.R.S., LL.D.

THE LATE SIR HENRY COLE.

We have recorded the death of this distinguished member of the Civil Service, and of what may be called the Social Service, who during fifty years worked successfully for the public benefit in a variety of institutions, but more especially in the Great Exhibition, and at the South Kensington Museum. He was born at Bath, on July 15, 1808, the son of Captain Cole, 82nd Foot; was educated at Christ's Hospital, entered the Civil Service in 1823, and became an assistant keeper of Public Records. He wrote several works under the nom de plume of "Felix Summerly," and gained a prize of £100 offered by the Government for suggestions for developing the penny postage plan of Sir Rowland Hill. As one of the executive committee of the Exhibition of 1851, he laboured with great zeal and ability, and was equally active in promoting the formation of the Science and Art Department, under the Committee of the Privy Council on Education. To the Science and Art Department, in 1852, he was appointed senior Secretary, and subsequently Inspector-General. In 1860 he was appointed Superintendent of the South Kensington Museum, which establishment he organised. In 1855 he was British Commissioner for the Paris Exhibition, and in 1867 acted as Secretary to the Royal Commissioners for the Paris Exhibition of that year. For his eminent services in connection with the various British, Foreign, and Colonial Exhibitions, and the Science and Art Department, with South Kensington Museum, he was created a C.B. in 1871, and a K.C.B. in 1875. On his retirement, in 1873, he was succeeded in his office by Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen, K.C.M.G., who had long helped energetically to ensure the complete working of Sir Henry Cole's plans of art instruction.

The funeral of Sir Henry Cole, which took place at West Brompton Cemetery on Saturday last, was attended by Earl Spencer, President of the Committee of Council; the Right Hon. A. J. Mundella, M.P., Vice-President; General Sir Dighton Probyn, V.C. (representing the Prince of Wales); Sir Charles Dilke, M.P.; Sir F. Sandford; Mr. Poynter, R.A.; Sir Edmund Du Cane, Sir G. Birdwood, Professor Huxley, and many of the officials and workmen employed at the South Kensington Museum. Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen was prevented from attending, but among the mourners were Mr. Fowke and Colonel Donnelly (the chief executive officer and assistant-secretary of the South Kensington Museum). Canon Knox Little, of Manchester, delivered an impressive address, in which allusion was made to the character and work of the deceased.

An influential meeting was held at the Mansion House on the 20th inst. in support of the International Fisheries Exhibition, proposed to be held in London in 1883. The Duke of Edinburgh spoke warmly in behalf of the scheme; and the American Minister expressed a confident hope that the proposal would be cordially responded to by the United States. Resolutions approving of the exhibition, which is to be under the patronage of the Queen, were unanimously adopted.

THE LATE MR. DARWIN.

The death, on Wednesday in last week, of Mr. Charles Robert Darwin, the eminent naturalist and philosophical inquirer of world-wide renown, has called forth, in England and in every civilised country, unanimous and unqualified testimonies to his great merits as the leading scientific mind of his time. During forty years past, living in comparative retirement at his country residence, Down House, near Farnborough, Kent, Mr. Darwin has steadfastly pursued his experimental researches, and has from time to time published their results, with those of his profound and comprehensive speculations, till he has gradually won the assent of all well-informed persons to a few grand principles concerning the development of specific forms of organic life. His theory of the origin of species, vegetable and animal, referred them to the operation of a general law of nature, in the universal struggle of living organisms for subsistence, and in the competition for opportunities of reproducing their kind, tending to the survival of the fittest types, and to the modification of their progeny, in the course of successive generations, by more and more distinctive peculiarities growing up in those organs or features which aided most effectually in the preservation of the race. Individual types of exceptional vigour, and with particular adaptation to surrounding circumstances, would thus become the progenitors of distinct species. Mr. Darwin went so far, in his famous book which appeared in November, 1859, formally announcing this view of natural history, as to say,

PRINCE LEOFOLD, DUKE OF ALBANY.

PRINCESS HELEN OF WALDECK, DUCHESS OF ALBANY.

THE LATE SIR HENRY COLE, K.C.B.

"I cannot doubt that the theory of descent, with modification, embraces all the members of the same class. I believe that animals have descended from at most only four or five progenitors, and plants from an equal or lesser number." He looked forward even to a higher generalisation. "Analogy would lead me one step farther," he said; "namely, to the belief that all animals and plants have descended from some one prototype; but this inference is chiefly grounded on analogy, and it is immaterial whether or not it be accepted. The case is different with the members of each great class, as the Vertebrata, the Articulata, &c., for here we have distinct evidence that all have descended from a single parent." We may quote also the impressive words with which Darwin concluded his treatise. "From the war of nature, from famine and death, the most exalted object which we are capable of conceiving—namely, the production of the higher animals, directly follows. There is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one; and that whilst this planet has gone cycling on according to the fixed law of gravity, from so simple a beginning endless forms, most beautiful and most wonderful, have been and are being evolved."

In the "Origin of Species," above quoted, Mr. Darwin had not actually expressed his views as to the ancestry of Man, though he had left them to be very clearly inferred. "It seemed to me sufficient to indicate that by this work 'light would be thrown on the origin of man and his history,' for this implied that man "must be included with other organic beings in any general conclusion respecting his manner of appearance on this earth." But in the "Descent of Man, and Selection in Relation to Sex," which was published in 1871, Mr. Darwin expressly dealt with this most interesting question. He presented man as co-descendant with the catarrhine or "down-nostriled" monkeys, from a hairy quadruped, furnished with a tail and pointed ears, and probably a climber of trees. Nay, he traced back the chain of descent until he found as the progenitor of all the vertebrate animals some aquatic creature, hermaphrodite, provided with gills, and with brain, heart, and other organs imperfectly developed. The treatise concludes by remarking what are the hopes which the advance of the human race in past ages seems fairly to justify; he says we are not, however, concerned "with hopes or fears, but only with the truth as far as our reason allows us to discover it. I have given the evidence to the best of my ability; and we must acknowledge, as it seems to me, that man with all his noble qualities, with sympathy which feels for the most debased, with benevolence which extends not only to other men but to the humblest living creature, with his god-like intellect which has penetrated into the movements and constitution of the solar system—with all these exalted powers—man still bears in his bodily frame the indelible stamp of his lowly origin."

After the publication of his first great work, Darwin continued to gather evidence tending to strengthen his theory. In 1862 he published his remarkable work on "Fertilisation of Orchids;" and in 1867 his "Domesticated Animals and Cultivated Plants; or, the Principles of Variation, Inheritance, Reversion, Crossing, Interbreeding, and Selection under Domestication." In 1872 Mr. Darwin published "The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals;" in 1875, "Insectivorous Plants;" in 1876, "Cross and Self Fertilisation in the Vegetable Kingdom;" and in 1877, "Different Forms of Flowers in Plants of the Same Species." Only last year appeared his work upon Earth-worms, in which he traced the operations of worms in gradually covering the surface of the globe with a layer of mould.

Mr. Darwin was son of Mr. Robert Darwin, a country physician, and grandson of Dr. Erasmus Darwin, a man of considerable literary and scientific attainments, author of "The Botanic Garden" and other poems, and of "Zoonomia" and other ingenious speculative philosophical works. The mother of Mr. Charles Darwin was a daughter of Josiah Wedgwood, the eminent art-manufacturer of Staffordshire. The late Mr. Darwin was born at Shrewsbury, on Feb. 12, 1809, and was educated at Shrewsbury Grammar School, at the University of Edinburgh, and at Christ's College, Cambridge. Having inherited a good private fortune, he engaged in no business or profession, but devoted his whole life to natural science. One of his instructors, the Rev. Mr. Henslow, professor of botany at Cambridge, recommended him to Captain Fitzroy and the Lords of the Admiralty, when a naturalist was to be chosen to accompany the surveying expedition of H.M.S. Beagle, which sailed Dec. 27, 1831, and returned to England Oct. 22, 1836, having made a scientific circumnavigation of the globe. Mr. Darwin served without salary, and partly paid his own expenses on condition that he should have the entire disposal of his zoological, botanical, and geological collections. On returning to England he published a "Journal of Researches into the Geology and Natural History" of the various countries he had visited in South America and the Pacific Ocean. In addition to numerous papers on various scientific subjects, Mr. Darwin edited the "Zoology of the Voyage of the Beagle," and wrote three separate volumes on geology—viz., "The Structure and Distribution of Coral Reefs," 1842, second edition, 1874; "Geological Observations on Volcanic Islands," 1844; and "Geological Observations on South America," 1846. Among Mr. Darwin's subsequent works were a "Monograph of the Family Cirripedia," published by the Ray Society in 1851-3, and on the "Fossil Species," by the Palaeontographical Society.

On Sunday last, both in Westminster Abbey and in St. Paul's Cathedral, the preachers spoke of Mr. Darwin's life and labours, praising him for his "pure and earnest love of truth," and his patient care and industry in its pursuit. He was, said Canon Prothero, "the greatest man of science of his day, but was so entirely a stranger to intellectual pride and arrogance that he stated with the utmost modesty opinions of the truth of which he was himself convinced, but which, he was aware, could not be universally agreeable or acceptable. Surely in such a man lived that charity which is the very essence of the true spirit of Christ." In like manner, Canon Barry, who preached at Westminster in the evening, referred to Mr. Darwin as a leader of scientific thought, observing that "the fruitful doctrine of evolution, with which the late Professor's name would always be associated, lent itself at least as readily to the old promise of God as to more modern but less complete explanations of the universe. The principle of selection was by no means alien to the Christian religion, but it was selection exercised under the Divine intelligence and determined by the spiritual fitness of each man for life hereafter. And to man was accorded the privilege of free will, which enabled him to be a fellow-worker with God in the great scheme of Providence. In the natural life of the brute creation the struggle for existence was the constant and dominant motive; but the spiritual life of mankind was refreshed and intensified by obedience to the contrary doctrine of self-sacrifice, which lay at the root of all the teaching of the Gospel."

Canon Liddon, in his sermon at St. Paul's, observed "that when Professor Darwin's books on the 'Origin of Species' and on the 'Descent of Man' first appeared they were largely regarded by religious men as containing a theory necessarily hostile to religion. A closer study had greatly modified any such impression." It is seen that, whether the creative activity of God is manifested through catastrophes, as the phrase goes, or in progressive evolution, it is still His creative activity, and the really great questions beyond remain untouched. The evolutionary process, supposing it to exist, must have had a beginning: who began it? It must have had material to work with: who furnished it? It is itself a law or system of laws: who enacted them? Even supposing that the theory represents absolute truth, and is not merely a provisional way of looking at things incidental to the present stage of knowledge, these great questions are just as little to be decided by physical science now as they were when Moses wrote the Pentateuch; but there are apparently three important gaps in the evolutionary sequence which it is well to bear in mind. There is the great gap between the highest animal instinct and the reflective, self-measuring, self-analysing thought of man. There is the greater gap between life and the most organized matter. There is the greatest gap of all between matter and nothing. At these three points, as far as we can see, the Creative Will must have intervened otherwise than by way of evolution out of existing materials—to create mind, to create life, to create matter. But, beyond all question, it is our business to respect in science, as in other things, every clearly ascertained report of the senses; for every such report represents a fact, and a fact is sacred as having its place in the Temple of Universal Truth."

Mr. Darwin married, in 1831, his cousin, Miss Emma Wedgwood, and he leaves behind him, besides his widow, five sons and two daughters.

The funeral of Mr. Darwin took place in Westminster Abbey on Wednesday last. He is buried next to the grave of Sir Isaac Newton, with whom, and with Dalton, the discoverer of the atomic theory of physics, Darwin has been ranked by some recent commentators upon the progress of the natural sciences.

PRINCESS HELEN OF WALDECK-PYRMONT.

The correspondent of the Daily News in Paris states:—"I met yesterday (last Saturday) a relative of the Princess Helen, who furnished me with many details about her. Prince Leopold's bride designate is quite a scholar, although a simple and lady-like country girl. Her greatest pleasure at Arolsen, which is a secluded picturesque spot, was found in study. The Princess is very spontaneous and open, recites with taste, and is very musical. At Pyrmont there is a theatre in which a fairly good company plays in summer. At Arolsen dramatic entertainments are given in the Schloss, in the grand saloon of which a stage has been erected. The players are amateurs. There used to be special Christmas performances when the three eldest daughters of the Prince, who are all accomplished elocutionists, were unmarried. The last spectacle which came off there was prettily imagined, and had the interest of actuality. The back scene represented Claremont, and the stage was festooned with garlands and true-love knots. Princess Helen, with a likeness of Prince Leopold suspended from her neck, entered, dressed in a bride's toilet, and sat down under an old tree. The daughters of the Prince's tenants, of the tradespeople of Arolsen, and the girls who attend the public and private schools were introduced in groups. Their hats were decorated with bouquets of spring flowers. They presented little home-made gifts, tokens of respectful affection. The governess of Princess Ella marshalled them to places reserved for them on the stage, and, when Princess Helen thanked them all; they sang in choral parts a wedding hymn. She kissed all those who had been prepared with her for confirmation, and hoped they would think of her as a sister. The deputations were then conducted to the hall to dine."

Yesterday week the thirty-third anniversary festival of the Asylum for Idiots was held at the Albion, Aldersgate-street, under the presidency of Mr. Alderman Fowler, M.P., who was supported by Sir H. Parkes, K.C.M.G., Mr. W. H. Wills, M.P., and the Baron de Ferrières, M.P. The company numbered eighty ladies and gentlemen. Mr. J. Abbot, J.P., in responding to the board of management, appealed for funds to clear off a debt of £2000; an appeal which was met with a liberal response to the amount of £2636, including 500 guineas from a Jewish lady, £500 from Mr. and Mrs. T. S. Child, and 100 guineas from the Dowager Marchioness of Westminster.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F J W (Hilkey).—Thanks for the cutting from the "Northumbrian." We are glad to see the "canny foun" again represented in the chess world.
E P W (Southampton).—Please send a diagram of the position, and we shall be glad to comply with your request.
P J (Broadmoor).—All correct solutions are carefully noted and acknowledged, but not in the same week in which they are received, owing to our early preparation for the press. Your problem shall be examined.
H B (Creston).—We have not the position at hand, but shall endeavour to refer to it in the course of next week.
W J E (Dewsbury).—Thanks for the full report of the chess meeting in your town. We have, as you will see, availed ourselves of it.
N R (Freckenham).—Please to re-examine the position.
J N B (Glifton).—A committee acquainted with all the facts should decide your question. As you state them, however, we think that C. should retire from the tourney, and that all his games, lost and won, should be cancelled.
J C W (St. Leonard).—No problem by the late Mr. Lowenthal has appeared in this column. You refer, probably, to one by the late Mr. Boden, the solution of which was published some weeks ago.
INTERROGATOR.—Such a "dual mate" as you describe does not affect the soundness of the problem. It would, however, affect its value when compared with another free from such a blemish.
W B S (New-croft).—We are obliged for the information.
PROBLEMS received with thanks from F H (Munich) and G W M (Manchester), and game from E J L (Isleworth).

The next annual meeting of the Counties' Chess Association will be held at Manchester during the week commencing on July 31. Liberal prizes will be offered by the executive, and the Manchester chessplayers are resolved that nothing shall be wanting on their part to ensure the success of the meeting. Intending competitors should address the honorary secretary of the Association, the Rev. A. B. Skipworth, Tetford, Horncastle.

On the 19th inst., the Rev. Mr. Wayte played eight members of the Bath Chess Club simultaneously, and of the fourteen games contested won thirteen.

A return-match between the New-croft Club and the chess circle attached to the Peckham Liberal Club was played at the New-croft Hall last week. The play resulted in an easy victory for the home team, who scored 17½ out of a possible 19.

The twenty-seventh annual meeting of the West Yorkshire Chess Association was held on Saturday last in the Co-operative Hall, Dewsbury. The gathering was larger than usual; such important towns as Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, Dewsbury, Barnsley, Wakefield, and Sheffield being all represented by deputations from clubs and in the lists of the several tournaments. The chief tournament resulted in Mr. Mills, of Leeds, carrying off the first prize; Messrs. Whittaker, of Bradford, and Mr. Hussey, of Leeds, dividing the second; and Mr. Cassell, of Bradford, securing the third. The result of tourney B was:—Half first prize, Mr. Wright—the rest divided; second prize, one moiety to Mr. Woodhead—the other shared by Messrs. Rhodes and Robertson. Messrs. Jordan and Edisson, won the first and second prizes in tourney C, and Messrs. Birdsall and Crofts carried off the honours in tourney D.

At a meeting held after tea at the Wellington Hotel, Mr. Ward, president of the Association for the current year, occupied the chair, and on behalf of himself and colleagues gave the visitors a hearty welcome; and it was then resolved that the next annual meeting shall be held at Bradford. Some discussion ensued upon the failure of the late negotiations for a match between the counties of Lancashire and Yorkshire. Mr. Hussey, of Leeds, declaring that all must endorse the wisdom of the course pursued by his county in letting the match fall through. Mr. Yates, of Dewsbury, expressed regret that their efforts to arrange the match had failed, and proposed a resolution to the effect "That this association would be glad to see a match arranged next year between Lancashire and Yorkshire on a basis of not less than seventy-five competitors on each side." The discussion was continued by Mr. Wright, who observed that if the Lancastrians would not come to Yorkshire, let the Yorkshiremen go to Lancashire. The resolution was carried, and the meeting shortly afterwards was brought to a conclusion.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Sept. 21, 1881) of Mr. John Hodgson, late of Gilston Park, Harlow, Herts, and of No. 24, Sussex-square, Hyde Park, who died on the 15th ult., was proved on the 17th inst. by William Hodgson, the brother, and Edward Salvin Bowlby, the nephew, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £688,000. The testator devised the Gilston Park estate and all his manors, farms, lands, tithes, and hereditaments in the counties of Essex and Herts, including the advowson of Eastwick, and all other his real estate, to the use of his brother, William Hodgson, for life; with remainder to his nephew, Edward Salvin Bowlby, for life; with remainder to his son Frank Remington Bowlby for life, with remainder to his first and other sons successively in tail male. All the residue of his property he gives to his said brother absolutely.

The will (dated Dec. 30, 1881) of Mr. William Henry Ryder, late of No. 17, New Bond-street, jeweller, and of Telford Lodge, Streatham, was proved on the 15th inst. by George John Shaw, Charles Dupin Drayson, and George William Ryder, the nephew, the executors, the value of the personal estate being over £128,000. The testator bequeaths £1000 to the Wolverhampton Orphan Asylum; £500 each to the London Hospital, Charing-cross Hospital, the Royal Free Hospital, Gray's-inn-road; the Goldsmiths' Benevolent Institution, the London Orphan Asylum, the Middlesex Hospital, St. George's Hospital, and the Home for Homeless Boys and Girls in connection with the training-ships Arethusa and Chichester;—£250 each to the poor-boxes at the Mansion House, Marylebone Police Court, Great Marlborough-street Police Court, Lambeth Police Court, Worship-street Police Court, Westminster Police Court, Bow-street Police Court, Clerkenwell Police Court, the Thames Police Court, and Southwark Police Court;—£250 each also to the Orphan Working School, Haverstock-hill; Westminster Hospital, the Hospital for Consumption, Brompton; the Silver Trade Pension Society, and the Royal Society of St. Anne's Schools;—£150 to Miss Sharman's Home or Orphanage, West-square, Lambeth; £100 to the Little Sisters of the Poor, Notting-hill, to be paid by four quarterly payments of £25 each; £100 to the Evelina Hospital; and substantial and numerous annuities and legacies to his brothers, sister-in-law, nephews, niece, and other relatives, executors, friends, and others. The capital and securities producing the annuities, on the death of the respective annuitants, are in most instances given to the children of his nephew, George William Ryder. All the legacies and annuities are to be paid free of duty. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust for his said nephew, George William Ryder, for life, and then for all his children.

The will (dated March 25, 1881), with a codicil (dated Dec. 13 in the same year), of David Powell, Esq., late of Heath Lodge, Hampstead, and formerly of No. 148, Lendenhall-street, has been proved in London by the executors and trustees—namely, his brother-in-law, Mr. Robert Pryor, and his sons, Mr. David Powell and Mr. Leonard Marlborough Powell. The testator by his will devises his real estate upon trusts for sale, the proceeds to be distributed in the same way as the personal property, which latter has been sworn to amount in value to £58,103 net. Among other legacies given by his will, the testator gives to his daughter, Miss Wilhelmina Louisa Powell, a legacy of £1000, and he gives legacies to his children's late governess and to various gentlemen in the employ of the firm of Cotesworth and Powell, and legacies and annuities to his servants and others; and he gives to each of his sons, Mr. David Powell and Mr. Henry Pryor Powell, £5000, and confirms the arrangement made with them for the loan to them of a further sum of £40,000 for a period of years; and he directs the net proceeds of his residuary estate to be divided into nine equal shares, and each of his children to have a share, the daughters' shares being paid to the trustees of their respective marriage settlements. By the codicil the testator gives to his other children in equal shares the share in his residuary estate of his daughter Ellen Marion Powell, who had died since the date of his will; and he directs that a certain reversionary property, to which he became entitled on her death, shall pass to his other children by his second marriage, to the exclusion of his issue by his first marriage, and in other respects he confirms his will.

The will (dated June 27, 1877) of Mr. Joseph Walton Clementson, late of Shelton, Hanley, Staffordshire, earthenware manufacturer, who died on March 29, 1880, at Llandudno, was proved on the 23rd ult. by Edward John Baxter and Matthew Clementson, the brother, the acting executors, the personal estate exceeding £27,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Selina Clementson, £150 and his copyhold residence, with the furniture, plate, and effects, and an annuity of £400 (to be reduced to £200 in the event of her marrying again) for life or widowhood; and the residue to all his children.

The will (dated Dec. 17, 1877), with a codicil (dated Nov. 26, 1878), of Mr. William Slocombe, late of 1, St. John's Villas, Upper Holloway, who died on Feb. 6 last, has been proved by Matthew Harbison and William Lyne, the executors, the value of the personal estate being nearly £18,000. The testator leaves to the National Life-Boat Institution, the Asylum for Idiots, Earlswood, and the Linendrapers' Institution, £900 each; to the Alexandra Orphanage, the Asylum for Deaf and Dumb Children, Kent-road, the Schools for the Indigent Blind, and the Hospital for incurables, £800 each; to the Chichester Training Ship, £750; to the Ware-housemen and Clerks Schools, £700; to the Police Orphanage, and the Royal Humane Society, £500 each;—to the Asylum for Fatherless Children, Reedham; the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, the Royal Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, City-road; the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Brompton; and the Little Boys Home, Farningham, £400 each; to the Fever Hospital, Liverpool-road, £300; to each of the Metropolitan Police Court poor-boxes, £50; to Mrs. Williams, of Swansea, £1200; to Mrs. Jones, of Radnor Villa, Surbiton, £500; to Ann Connor, his servant, £400; to Mrs. Mary Groves, £100; to each of his executors £500 (all free of legacy duty); and the residue to the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond-street.

The will (dated Feb. 4, 1880) of the Hon. Maria Margaret Stanley, daughter of the first Baron Stanley of Alderley, late of Bacres, Hambledon, Bucks, who died on Feb. 26 last, was proved on the 25th ult., at the Oxford district registry, by the Rev. John Hugh Way and the Hon. Edward Lylph Stanley, M.P., the nephew, the executors, the value of the personal estate being over £15,000. The testatrix bequeaths to her niece the Hon. Maria Alethea Stanley, £3500; to her niece Miss Jane Henrietta A'Deane, £4000; legacies to executors, god-children, and two servants; and the residue of her property to her niece Alethea Louisa Grenfell.

The will (dated May 6, 1876) of Dame Dorothy Fairbairn, widow of Sir William Fairbairn, Bart., late of Polygon, Ardwick, near Manchester, who died on Jan. 11 last, at Waltham Saint Lawrence, Twyford, Berks, was proved on the 27th ult. by the Rev. Adam Henderson Fairbairn, the son and sole executor, to whom she devises all her real estate, and gives and bequeaths all her personal estate. The personalty exceeds £4000.

DESIGN FOR WINDSOR TAPESTRY: "MEN OF KENT MARCHING IN FRONT OF THE ARMY OF HAROLD," BY J. E. HODGSON, R.A.—SEE PAGE 414.

Marriage of The Duke of ALBANY

ARRIVAL OF THE BRIDE.

Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany.

THE marriage of Prince Leopold, the youngest son of our beloved Queen, is an auspicious event, which calls forth the cordial sympathies of loyal subjects throughout the whole British Empire. There is a mutual sympathy; for her Majesty has ever shown a deep and practical interest in everything that concerns the welfare of her people.

This kindly interest is very apparent in her Journals, which were written with no view to publication, and is historically placed on record throughout Sir Theodore Martin's admirable and valuable "Life of the Prince Consort," fortunately now accessible to the people in a cheap edition. Then there are those true-hearted and womanly letters, sent, now and again, on occasion, by the Queen, and always at the right time, to comfort the suffering or the bereaved, in palace or cottage, at home or abroad; or, it may be, to express her own grateful sense of the kindly feeling shown by her people towards herself and those dear to her after an illness or a providential escape.

Her motherly care of her children, her many unostentatious and kindly deeds of charity among the humble poor, and her domestic virtues endear her to the nation and add lustre to the Throne.

Under such circumstances, is it to be wondered at that a nation should spontaneously sympathise with and seek to share her sorrow or her joy? The tie between ruler and subject, very happily for all concerned, is in this case a loyal attachment, firmly cemented by mutual confidence, friendship, and affection. In her own words, applied to "our Princess Alice," we may truly say that her life has afforded "a bright example of loving tenderness and sympathy, courageous devotion, and self-sacrifice to duty." Hence, to-day, the universal congratulation and cordial good wishes breathed for the happiness of the young married people, whom we all feel to be somehow related to us—to be our own connections, of whom we are very proud, and in whose welfare our Queen, the first lady in the land, as a sensible, highly-gifted, and affectionate mother, is most deeply interested.

Prince Leopold, the fourth son of her Majesty, was born on April 7, 1853, and is consequently twenty-nine years of age. The Queen, when writing to her uncle Leopold, King of Belgium, shortly after the birth of her youngest son, in regard to the honoured name he was to receive, said in a letter addressed to Brussels, and dated, "Buckingham Palace, April 18, 1853.—I can report most favourably of myself, for I have never been better or stronger. Stockmar will have told you that Leopold is to be the name of our fourth young gentleman. It is a mark of love and affection, which I hope you will not disapprove. It is a name which is the dearest to me after Albert's, and one which recalls the almost only happy days of my sad childhood. To hear 'Prince Leopold' again will make me think of all those days. His other names will be George, Duncan, Albert; . . . George is after the King of Hanover, and Duncan is a compliment to dear Scotland."

Somewhat delicate in his early and boyish years, the Prince's education, conducted by private tutors, was subject to many interruptions on account of his frequent indisposition. This delicacy of constitution, which has, fortunately, now been overcome, seriously interfered with his out-of-door exercise and athletic training, but admitted of his devoting more time to study than he could otherwise have done.

Cradled in culture, he has made exceptionally good use of his opportunities. The early training of the Royal Family has always been a matter of national pride and thankfulness; and although Prince Leopold was only about eight years old when he sustained the irreparable loss of his father the Prince Consort, the influence of precept and example had already told upon the formation of character; and the life-lessons acquired were not likely to be forgotten, confirmed and enforced as they have ever been by our gracious Queen.

It is well known that the Prince Consort made the education of the Royal children a matter of the deepest personal interest. He often spent several hours daily in promoting the individual training of his family.

"The trait," writes the Athenæum, "which personally distinguished the Prince Consort from other men, was his daily and hourly interest in the education of his children; not only their moral education—which no parent under any circumstances ought to neglect—but the ordinary training of the school-room. Of course the Royal Princes and Princesses had many teachers, but their chief instructor was the Prince. He not only furnished a general plan for their instruction, but superintended it himself; not only appointed to each one his and her teachers, but thought it his duty to read every book which was about to be put into their hands."

Reading, sketching, painting, etching, photography, gardening, relieved actual study, and served to interest them. At Osborne, the young Princes' practical work in building and carpentry is still preserved, a creditable monument of their constructive skill.

Prince Leopold, in the intellectual and moral traits of his character, his good-heartedness, and refinement, resembles his father and sisters, more, perhaps, than any of his Royal brothers; and, to our thinking, he has a great and useful career before him. Already he seems to be worthily following in the footsteps of his noble father,

"Hereafter, through all times, Albert the Good."

The childhood of Prince Leopold was passed under feminine tuition; and his governesses early taught him the rudiments of several modern languages, of history, and of music, which has always been one of his favourite pursuits. Mr. Jollye, who was one of the first of the Duke of Connaught's tutors, assisted likewise in the early education of the Duke of Albany. In 1861, by the advice of the physicians, the Prince Consort was induced to send his youngest son to Cannes for the winter, under the charge of the late General Sir Edward and Lady Bowater. They were accompanied by Miss Bowater, now Lady Knightley, and recently appointed Extra Lady in Waiting to the Duchess of Albany.

While Prince Leopold was at Cannes, in December of that year, his father, the late Prince Consort, to the great sorrow of the whole nation, was taken from this world by death. Sir Edward Bowater died about the same time, and the plans for Prince Leopold's education were necessarily interrupted by these events.

Her Majesty the Queen went to Germany in 1862, and took his Royal Highness with her; in later years he several times accompanied the Queen in her visits to that country. Colonel Sir Howard Elphinstone, K.C.B., who was then Governor to Prince Arthur (now Duke of Connaught), took charge in 1862 of Prince Leopold; soon afterwards Dr. Buff, now Keeper of the Archives at Augsburg, became the Prince's tutor; but at that time several of the Eton masters used regularly to come to Windsor to assist in the instruction of the young Princes; and whenever the Royal Family was at Osborne, the Rev. Mr. Prothero, Vicar of Whippingham (now Canon Prothero), rendered similar assistance.

Colonel Sir John Cowell, K.C.B., who had been governor to Prince Alfred, the Duke of Edinburgh, upon the termination of that engagement became governor to Prince Leopold; and held this charge until 1866, when he was appointed Master of the Queen's Household. The Rev. Canon Duckworth was tutor to his Royal Highness, and Captain Stirling, R.A., for a time succeeded to the charge vacated by Sir John Cowell. It was thought needful, about that period, to have a physician in constant charge of his Royal Highness; and for this Dr. Wickham Legg was chosen, who is now Physician to St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He was succeeded by Dr. Poore, now Physician to University Hospital. As tutor, next to the Rev. Canon Duckworth, Mr. Robert Hawthorn Collins, M.A. of the University of Oxford, was appointed, but at the end of 1870 remained in the principal charge of the education of his Royal Highness upon the retirement of Canon Duckworth.

The University career of Prince Leopold, under the direction of Mr. Collins, began in 1872, when his Royal Highness, entering Christ Church College, was matriculated at Oxford by the present Dean of Christchurch, then Vice-Chancellor of the University. A residence for him was found at Wykeham House, a short distance out of the town, and we give a view of that mansion. The Prince, while at Oxford, used to attend lectures daily, with other undergraduates. Among the Professors whose courses he regularly attended were Professors Bonamy Price, Creighton, Kitchin, and Sidney Owen. His special studies were political economy, history, and languages. Professor Max Müller, the philologist, was a constant attendant at the residence of his Royal Highness. The Prince also attended Professor Ruskin's lectures on Art, and missed no opportunity of acquiring knowledge and culture.

His Royal Highness, while at the University, did not go much into society, but frequently entertained at his own house. His visitors there included not only his undergraduate friends, but the principal senior men of the University, Masters of Colleges, Professors, and others. Our Illustration of "An Afternoon at Wykeham House" represents the scene in a tent, in the garden, one summer day, when Mr. Walter Campbell, a fellow-undergraduate, drew a portrait of the Prince; the third person in the tent is Mr. Collins. His Royal Highness joined in all the ordinary social occupations of undergraduates at Oxford. He was a member, if not one of the founders, of the Oxford Musical Club, which has just now celebrated the first decade of its existence. He regularly attended the meetings of the Chess Club formed among the undergraduates; he went to the debates at the Union, and was a member of the Bullingdon Cricket Club. His chief friends were members of Loder's Club, which was composed entirely of Christ Church men, some of whom have since won distinction in the public service or in Parliament. The Prince was also initiated as a Freemason, while at Oxford; he subsequently became Master of a Lodge, and is now Provincial Grand Master of Oxfordshire in that fraternity.

The Prince's career at Oxford was brought to a close at the Encaenia of 1876, when he received the diploma of D.C.L. from the hands of the then Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Sewell, Warden of New College, who spoke in the highest terms of the manner in which the Prince had comported himself, and the good example that he had shown to other undergraduates, during his residence at the University.

Inheriting his father's, the late Prince Consort's, refined tastes, thoughtful methodical ways, and discriminating love of literature, he devoted his leisure hours to the careful study of the world's greatest Poet, and was elected a member of the New Shakspeare Society. In 1867 Mr. Richard Bentley published, and by permission dedicated to his Royal Highness, an edition called "The Prince's Shakspeare;" and more recently Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co. also dedicated to him "The Leopold Shakspeare."

With no taint of flattery, it may be said, in truth, of our Duke of Albany that he is "A scholar, and a ripe and good one." On reaching his majority, in 1874, he manifested his warm interest in the New Shakspeare Society by presenting each of his fellow-members with a beautiful and costly facsimile copy of "Romeo and Juliet," containing the parallel texts of the first two quartos, of 1597 and 1599, with an introduction and marginal collations of subsequent issues, carefully prepared on purpose by P. A. Daniel, of Gray's Inn.

Among the pursuits for which he has a personal predilection, and considerable talent, are the study of music, and that of modern languages; he speaks both German and French with great facility, and has a fair knowledge of Italian. While at Oxford he studied these three languages with great assiduity; but Professor Volpe, the Italian master at Eton, was his principal instructor in that language.

The health of his Royal Highness, originally delicate, was the object of great care and attention in his earlier years. He then endured severe illnesses, through which he passed without lasting injury, thanks in great measure to the skill and devoted attention of Sir William Jenner, whose merits on that score are fully acknowledged by the Prince and by the Queen. Dr. Acland, at Oxford, had medical charge of his Royal Highness while residing at Wykeham House; it was this physician who attended the Prince of Wales in his visit to America some twelve years before.

In 1874, provision was made for the Prince, and, in the House of Lords, the Duke of Richmond, in moving an address in reply to the Queen's Message, observed that the young Prince who was its subject had not, on account of his youth, had the advantage of the personal example of his illustrious father, but had been brought up in a manner in every way to imitate and follow the noble example. The assiduity that Prince Leopold had shown in all the departments of study in which he had been occupied gave grounds for believing that he would fit himself to take the important position in the country to which his birth entitled him; and from what had been seen of other members of the Royal family, they might venture to hope that his Royal Highness would attain that popularity which attached to every member of the illustrious House. Earl Granville seconded the motion, and, from some personal acquaintance with the illustrious Prince, was able to say that there were few young men of his years who had cultivated their natural abilities with greater assiduity and success than Prince Leopold had done. The hopes expressed on that occasion have all been more than realised in the various public appearances of the Prince when called upon to speak in behalf of Educational or Charitable Institutions. His "apt and gracious words" indicate an amount of intellectual energy, clear insight, suggestive originality, refined culture, and good-heartedness, which must at once command the admiration of all thoughtful minds, whether uttered by a Royal Prince or by an ordinary citizen.

After quitting Oxford, in 1876, the Prince made a tour in Italy, and spent some little time at Florence, where he mixed in Italian society, and improved his acquaintance with the Italian language. He was accompanied in that country first by Major Pickard, who was subsequently appointed one of the Queen's private secretaries, but who died, much to the regret of her Majesty, not very long afterwards. On leaving Florence, the Prince went to Venice, thence to Milan, and to the Italian Lakes. At this time his staff was increased by the appointment of the Hon. Alexander Yorke as Equerry, and of Dr. Royle, as Surgeon in Ordinary, to his Royal Highness. Captain Waller, R.A., subsequently acted as private secretary and Equerry; and Captain Percival, late of the Royal Dragoon Guards, has more recently been appointed an Extra Equerry. Mr. R. H. Collins, C.B., holds the offices of Secretary, and Comptroller of the Household.

In 1877, Prince Leopold took up his residence at Boyton Manor, in Wiltshire. This picturesque Elizabethan mansion, of which we give a View, is situated in the valley of the Wily, having Salisbury Plain on one side, and the Downs on the other side, towards Fonthill Abbey; it is at no great distance from Longleat, the seat of the Marquis of Bath. Boyton Manor is the property of Mr. Edmund Fane, now First Secretary of Legation at Madrid. It was anciently the home of the Giffards, a knightly race of high distinction under the Plantagenet reigns. Prince Leopold, while residing at Boyton Manor, took much pleasure in visiting all the places of historic interest in the neighbourhood. He there entertained many of his Oxford friends. Not long since, in revisiting the county, and presiding at a dinner of the Wiltshire Society, the Prince spoke with much feeling of the regret he had experienced in leaving Boyton, and of the regard he continues to cherish for those whose acquaintance he made in that neighbourhood.

His Royal Highness again went abroad in 1878, sojourned awhile at Nice, went to Corsica with the Duke of St. Albans, visited Naples, saw the ruins of Pompeii and Pæstum, revisited the Italian Lakes, and returned by way of Paris, where he spent some time in seeing the Exhibition. At Paris, upon this and former occasions, he was the guest of the late King of Hanover. In the autumn of the same year he visited the Queen of Hanover, at Gmünden. Prince Leopold was godson of the late King of Hanover. Soon after his return from this visit occurred the death of his sister, Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse-Darmstadt. The Prince again went abroad, to attend her funeral at Darmstadt. He has since been a frequent visitor there, cherishing much friendship and affection towards the Grand Duke and his family.

In 1879, his Royal Highness went in H.M.S. Lively on a cruise around the western coasts of England and Scotland, and by the north coast to Aberdeen, visiting the chief places of interest by the way. In the autumn of the same year he first took up his residence at Claremont, part of which was lent him by the Queen, and which is now the home of the Duke and Duchess of Albany.

Prince Leopold crossed the Atlantic in the following year, 1880, to visit his sister, Princess Louise, and her husband, the Marquis of Lorne, in Canada. He was attended by Sir John McNeill, on behalf of her Majesty, and by Mr. Collins, the Hon. A. Yorke, and Dr. Royle. While in America, his Royal Highness went to see the Falls of Niagara, and extended his tour to Chicago and Milwaukee. He was present at the great political Convention of the United States' Republican party, at Chicago, when General Garfield was chosen their candidate for the Presidency; and he heard General Garfield speak on that occasion. The rest of his time in Canada was mostly occupied with a pleasant salmon-fishing excursion to the Cascapedia, in company with the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise, with the Governor-General's suite. Prince Leopold was also the guest of Mr. George Stephen, at his fishing-place on some Canadian river; Mr. George Stephen, who is well known as one of the chief promoters of the Canadian Pacific Railway, has since been entertained by his Royal Highness at Claremont.

Last year, when the Duke of Albany made a lengthened stay with the Grand Duke of Hesse, at Wolfsgarten, a summer residence of his Serene Highness, he first met his future wife, Princess Helen of Waldeck. It was at Soden that he made her acquaintance; and the consequence was that, in November, he again went to Germany and met the Princess of Waldeck and her daughter at Frankfort, where the happy engagement was settled. His Royal Highness then made a short visit to Arolsen, the residence of the Prince and Princess of Waldeck, where he was greeted with a cordial reception by the subjects of the Prince; and he has since been there again. His recent sojourn at Mentone, while the Queen was there, is fresh in the remembrance of our readers.

At different times, when not occupied with the travels described, or with his own studies, the Duke of Albany has spent long intervals under the Queen's roof, assisting her Majesty in the discharge of her abundant business and duties. His Royal Highness has also, upon his own account, since his first appearance as a public speaker at Oxford, undertaken and performed a certain share of public business, presiding on various occasions at the meetings of useful and beneficent societies, and delivering impressive and instructive speeches. He is President of the Royal Society of Literature, a Trustee of the British Museum, and has, for two years, been Chairman of the Charity Organisation Society, his Address to which given last year was a judicious contribution to that cause. Many local and special charitable institutions have had the benefit of his patronage and advocacy. We append to this Memoir some passages of his most remarkable Addresses spoken upon such occasions. More recently, on Dec. 17, last year, accompanied by Prince and Princess Christian, he laid the foundation-stone of the new buildings of the "Princess Helena College," at Ealing, a new form of the institution which was formerly known as the "Adult Orphan Institution," in Regent's Park, and which was founded above sixty years ago as a memorial of the lamented Princess Charlotte. On March 14, of this year, he presided at a banquet at the Freemasons' Tavern in aid of the National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic, in Queen-square, Bloomsbury. It will also be remembered that the ceremony of uncovering the Temple Bar Memorial was performed by this popular Prince, at the request of the Lord Mayor and Corporation of London.

On May 24, 1881, announcement was made in the London Gazette that the Queen had been pleased to grant to his Royal Highness Prince Leopold George Duncan Albert the dignities of Baron Arklow, Earl of Clarence, and Duke of Albany. The new Peer took his seat in the House of Lords on June 20 last year.

The title "Duke of Albany," thus resuscitated, is a very ancient Scottish one. The etymological root of the word Albany is Alb, or Alp, primarily signifying white; then, high hills covered with snow; third, any high mountain range; fourth, it was applied to Britain as a mountainous island (with chalk cliffs on the south); and more specifically, Albany is still an old name for the Highlands of Scotland.

The title, we read, was first conferred, in 1398, on the second surviving son of Robert II., while he was Regent of Scotland. The second Duke of Albany died on the Castle Hill of Stirling, and the title was forfeited. It was subsequently revived, and conferred upon the second son of James II. The title was next bestowed upon Darnley, shortly before he was married to Queen Mary; and it was held successively by the second son of James VI. and by the second son of Charles I. As a British title it was borne by Prince Frederick, second son of George III. The name of Albany is also associated with Prince Charles Stuart, who for a time assumed the title of Count of Albany; indeed, throughout some four centuries it reappears in the most stirring episodes of Scottish history.

Possessed of good natural abilities, which have been well trained and rightly directed, we trust that the Duke of Albany may be enabled to take an active share in the counsels of the Upper Chamber of the Legislature. In the House of Lords the Prince will find scope for his aspirations, in duly originating or furthering measures which are calculated to promote the religious, educational, social, philanthropic, and general weal of the Empire.

Shortly after the conferring of the Dukedom on Prince Leopold by the Queen, his betrothal to Princess Helen of Waldeck-Pyrmont was officially announced. Probably the honour was intended to herald this joyful announcement.

In addition to the three Peerages above named, and his hereditary rank as a Prince of Great Britain and Duke of Saxony, the following honours, titles, and offices have been conferred upon his Royal Highness: Knight of the Order of the Garter, created in 1869; Knight of the Thistle, Grand Cross of the Star of India, Grand Cross of St. Michael and St. George, and Privy Councillor; he is also one of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, a Doctor of Civil Law, a Colonel in the Army, and a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn.

At the instance of the London Society for the Extension of University Teaching, a large and influential meeting was held on Feb. 19, 1879, in the Egyptian Hall, Mansion House. The Lord Mayor presided; and resolutions were moved by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., and by Prince Leopold, in advocacy of the objects of the Society, which were "to bring to the doors of as many inhabitants of London as possible education equal in quality to that which was given by the very highest and most competent men of the Universities."

"To all Englishmen," observed his Royal Highness, "it must be gratifying to find that the institutions of which they are so proud are not mere dead systems, but living organisms, which can expand under new circumstances, and meet new needs as they arise. Few of our English institutions have been the object of so long and widespread a reverence as our English Universities, and yet there was a time when they seemed to be in danger of falling out of harmony with the needs created. That reproach, I think, can no longer be urged against them, and we may fairly claim that they have of late taken the lead in all the most important educational reforms.

"We hear sometimes comparisons made between the German and English Universities, and not always with advantage to the latter. I personally have no means of making any such comparison, as my experience has been confined to Oxford; but I shall always look back on my residence as one of the greatest pleasures and privileges of my life—and I should find it hard to believe that any other University could surpass Oxford in the power of attaching alumni to herself. There is, however, one great advantage in the system of the German Universities which will strike everybody. They diffuse knowledge throughout a far wider class of the community than either Oxford or Cambridge University has hitherto reached.

"Learning in England has been too much regarded as the possession of a particular class. The condition of residence at Oxford and Cambridge, though most valuable and necessary for their own purposes, has kept away many students of narrow means. The University of London has now removed the barriers, and the old Universities are now uniting with her in offering to all Londoners a cheap course of instruction given by teachers of the same calibre as those who do the work in the Universities themselves. The undertaking of this great additional task indicates that a very strong spirit has arisen in the old seats of learning. It is not exactly a spirit of benevolence; for these lectures are not a work of charity, but will, it is to be hoped, become self-supporting after the first few years are passed. But it is a spirit of active sympathy with the wants and wishes of a very large class.

"Education has been too long ignored, but the impulse, of which these London lectures are the outcome, is shown in more ways than one, and will be felt in more than one University. To Professor Stuart and some other Cambridge men we owe the establishment of those systems of lectures in our great manufacturing centres, which are gradually developing into permanent institutions—strong, living children of the Alma Mater which gave them birth. But it is not only at Cambridge that it will be felt that men of culture and of learning hardly have a worthier aim than to carry their higher thoughts and more cultivated knowledge into many homes which perhaps have no other ways of making progress.

"Of such aims we, at Oxford, have a great and striking example. We have seen a man in whom the highest gifts of refinement and of genius reside, who yet has not grudged to give his best to others; who has made it his main effort—by gifts, by teaching, by sympathies—to spread among the artisans of villages and the labourers of our English fields the power of drawing a full measure of instruction and happiness from this wonderful world, which rich and poor gain alike from. We have seen such a man in Professor Ruskin; and among all the lessons which those who have had the privilege of his teaching and his friendship must have carried with them for life, none, I think, can have sunk deeper than the last:—that the highest wisdom and the highest treasure need not be costly or exclusive; that the greatness of a nation must be measured, not alone by its wealth and apparent power, but by the degree in which its people have learned together in the great world of books, of art, and of nature, pure and ennobling joys. I cannot think, then, that we need feel that this Society is providing teachers who are too good for the work which they are to do. It may be long before her students can follow them as far as they can lead; but the work which they have to teach will be taught all the better, the methods will be sounder, and the personal influence of the teacher will stimulate them all the more."

The Times, referring to this address, said:—

"The meeting at the Mansion House has revealed powers of expression in a member of the Royal family which rivalled those of a great English orator on a field peculiarly his own. The crowd which thronged the Egyptian Hall came to see a Prince and to hear Mr. Gladstone. As it listened to the former in his turn, it must have felt it had before it not merely a thinker, but a thinker with the gift of thinking aloud. No two better representatives of the cause of University teaching could have been selected than Prince Leopold and Mr. Gladstone."

On Feb. 25, 1879, his Royal Highness presided at the fifty-fifth anniversary and distribution of prizes and certificates in the theatre of the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution. Addressing the students, he spoke as follows of the need of technical education:—

"Properly instructed, I believe, our British artisan need fear no rival in the world. But, if he goes out untaught and ignorant in the battle of life, he is in danger of being outdone by the skill and education of the foreign workman."

Glad to see the facilities afforded, and the eagerness with which modern languages were studied in the classes, he said:—

"Foreign nations are not merely our competitors but our friends; and nothing, I believe, is likely to create so true a feeling of friendship and sympathy between one people and another as a practical knowledge of each others' speech. Sometimes, perhaps, as the proverb says, 'we take what is unknown to be magnificent;' but oftener, I think, we take it to be something unfriendly and distasteful to us. But we find that with every real increase of understanding of our fellow-men of different races, some unkindly illusion disappears; we learn to realise their likeness to ourselves, to sympathise with their national character, and to co-operate in their efforts after the common good.

"There is so much similarity in the conditions of all efforts and success, that even the studies which seem most remote from active life may always furnish a moral which we may adopt and employ. For instance, I notice that in what is called the Miscellaneous Department of your curriculum you provide instruction in the game of chess. This is not the most obviously practical of your subjects; but it has struck me that even those, if any there be, who desire to limit their education here to this branch alone, may learn some not unimportant lessons in life from the way in which you teach it.

"'Particular attention,' I see your programme says, 'is paid to the study of the openings.' Now, is it not true that, in life, as in chess, it is often the opening, and the opening only, which is under our own control? Later in the game the plans and wishes of others begin to conflict unpleasantly with our own. Sometimes it is as much as we can do to avoid being checkmated altogether. But for the first few moves we are free. We can display our pieces to the best advantage; we can settle on the line of action which best suits our powers; and we sometimes find that it will repay us to sacrifice a pawn or a piece so as to gain at once a position which may give us a decided advantage throughout the whole game. Does not this, too, remind us of early life? Must we not often be content to sacrifice some power, or present pleasure, or profit, to gain a vantage-ground which may help us to successes which self-indulgence could never have won? I am sure that among the bright young faces which I see around me there are many who have known what it is to labour against the grain—to begin a lesson when they would rather have sought amusement, and finish it when they would rather have gone to bed. And I am sure that such efforts of self-denial and conscientiousness form at least half the real benefit of education—that it would do us little good to wake up and find our heads magically stocked with all manner of facts, in comparison with the good which it does us to gain knowledge by strenuous and patient labour."

Referring to the philanthropy of which the Birkbeck Institution was the outcome, the Prince said:—"I believe I may truly say that no nation has produced a larger proportion of philanthropists than our own. No nation, I am sure I may assert, has been more eager to aid those philanthropists in life and to honour them when they have passed away. Learning is a commodity the demand for which grows with the supply. We have no need to fear a glut of science, as we may of manufactured goods. All the knowledge which we who now live can gain, can be made useful to ourselves and to those who come after us. Dr. Birkbeck was, no doubt, in the mere matter of money, a most generous man; but it was not his pecuniary generosity which caused his name to become a household word, but because he gave to his work the devotion of a life; and we thank and honour him for his example; for the greatest legacy a man can leave behind him, is the example which impels those who come after him to exalted aims."

Prince Leopold opened Firth College, at Sheffield, on Monday, Oct. 20, 1879, in the presence of a large gathering of those interested in higher education. The College, which is really a local home of University education, was erected at a cost of £20,000, and is the gift of Mr. Mark Firth to the town. In addition to providing the College, he also gave £5000 towards an endowment fund. His Royal Highness said upon this occasion:

"I have lately been reading a book about Sheffield, as Sheffield was more than a generation ago, written by a great master of style and language, and giving a startling picture of things as they then were. That book was 'Sibyl; or, the Two Nations,' by Benjamin Disraeli. And the two nations of which the title spoke were the nation of the rich and the nation of the poor. The wide gulf that has existed between class and class has, I trust, been in great measure bridged over now throughout all England—thanks to the statesmen of all parties alike, and not least to the illustrious author of this very book. I am sure the many who listen to me now could testify to the great and successful efforts that have been made in Sheffield itself to diffuse that sound education which has always proved to be so powerful an agent in reconciling the different classes, and teaching them to understand one another. I trust there will be many a Sheffield child who will take advantage of the benefits here alluded to: who, born in a poor and humble home, will attend your excellent primary schools, will gain one of your primary scholarships, will follow the course of your Firth College, and will proceed thence to take his or her degree with honours at one of the Universities to which Firth College will be affiliated. I say designedly 'his or her degree,' for your new College offers its teaching and its certificates to young men and young women alike. The University of London does the same thing, and Oxford and Cambridge have taken steps in the same direction; and I am told the new Victoria University of Manchester will not be behindhand in recognising the claims of women's minds to respect and to cultivation. It is greatly to be hoped that the young men and women of Sheffield will not neglect all these opportunities, and that they will learn to estimate the examinations they will be invited to pass at their true value—that is, as a means of guiding and stimulating their studies, and of showing to others how far they are competent to fill this or that position in life.

"One of the greatest gains which I anticipate for Sheffield from the Firth College is, that its affiliation to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge will enable many students to enter well prepared and on easier terms on residence in one or other of those Universities. Such residence I cannot but think may be made in itself an education such as no new institution can imitate or equal; and when I say this I am not thinking only of the unrivalled aids to study of a material kind which Oxford and Cambridge offer in the way of museums, and laboratories, and libraries, but rather of their time-honoured traditions and of the memories which they call up of the best and ablest spirits of bygone days. I remember, too, that in those ancient seats of learning are still to be found men who are examples of unworldliness and meditation in the midst of a hurrying age, and who teach us that it is still possible to love truth and wisdom more than fame and fortune.

"I may be allowed, perhaps, to point out, in the hearing of those now present, that Mr. Firth's generosity, great as it has been, leaves abundant scope for emulation among other wealthy men of Sheffield. Many more gifts will be needed before the spacious buildings can be filled with a permanent staff of teachers able to carry out your scheme of instruction in a worthy way, and to form in your midst a nucleus of intellectual life such as shall exercise a sensible influence in this great city. After saying that there is full room for gifts, need I add how great is the inducement to be a giver? And this privilege of making a marked and visible difference in human well-being and of seeing some great institution rise and flourish at your bidding, is one that can, perhaps, be more readily enjoyed by the great magnates of commerce and manufacture than by any other class. They, with their unfettered fortunes, must seem enviable in this respect to men who, apparently in possession of large incomes, are hampered by the extensive claims made upon them by their landed estates or other hereditary duties, who are compelled to restrict the aid they give to causes such as this to small and fitful donations. Those men who, with great wealth at their disposal, elect to spend it in mere sumptuousness and luxury are repaid, indeed, by admiration from certain persons and of a certain kind; but how far richer is the reward of those who, after spending what is needed to maintain with dignity their place in society, devote the remainder towards furthering the happiness of their fellow-men! Far-off generations shall rise up and call such men blessed, and the names they leave behind them shall be ranked with such names as those of Peabody in London; of Owens, at Manchester; of Mason, at Birmingham; of Firth, at Sheffield.

"And now, in conclusion, I should like to say a few words about the kind of benefits which I hope the institution of this college, and all the movement that is likely to follow, will confer on Sheffield. There will naturally be the intellectual benefits which invariably attend the progress of learning, philosophy, and general culture, of the opening out of new realms of thought, and of pleasures which the ignorant cannot know. But another, and, as it seems to me, an equally valuable effect of the culture, is to make us shrink from and hate all that is vulgar and false, and to prefer pure and simple pleasures—such as are open to all and can never be exhausted by any—to ostentation, vanity, and self-indulgence. Such, I venture to think, must have been Mr. Firth's feeling when he presented your town with a park before presenting it with a college. He must have desired above all things to give the children, who are compelled in this busy city to pass many hours each day amid dark and gloomy surroundings, an opportunity of learning from nature those lessons which are the rightful inheritance of childhood, and without which no man can be said to have had his fair chance in the world. Let it never be said, then, that it is necessary in any city for children to forego these innocent pleasures, and least of all let it be said in Sheffield—a city which has done so much to merit the admiration of England—and which receives with such abundant courtesy the guests whom its greatness attracts. And now I must thank you for the patience with which you have listened to the remarks which I have made, and express my earnest hope that this day's work may be an augury of fresh deeds yet to be done here in Sheffield—deeds that will bear out the spirit of the Poet Laureate's verses:—

'Men, my brothers, men, the workers, ever reaping something new;
That which they have done but earnest of the deeds that they shall do.'

And, among the things that you shall do, will be not only such as shall increase your wealth and spread your manufactures, but such as shall imbue you with that culture which descends from generation to generation, and that wisdom which should make of us all a people ever more worthy of our great country, the mother of mighty nations."

The opening of the Nottingham University College—which cost about £100,000, and can accommodate some 1400 students—took place on June 30, 1881. Besides those subjects which are taught in other schools and colleges, the course of training includes the sciences, both pure and applied—to say nothing of the manufacture of cloth, cotton, silk, and lace, weaving, bleaching, dyeing, tanning, and other arts, after attending which course the student may receive a certificate. Prince Leopold, who performed the opening ceremony, spoke in the Albert Hall, and gave utterance to the following sentiments:—

"The great advantage of the College is, that it offers opportunities to working-men which they never had before. While I am strongly in favour of elementary teaching, I am also a strong advocate of technical training. Such knowledge would raise the country in every respect, and there is another advantage in thorough technical training which should never be overlooked. To learn anything thoroughly, teaches us to respect what we learn. It teaches us to delight in our task for its own sake, and not for the sake of pay or reward. And the happiness of our lives depends much less on the actual value of the work which we do, than on the spirit in which we do it. If a man tries to do the very simplest and humblest work as well as he possibly can, it will be interesting to him, and he will be proud of it. But if he is only thinking of what he can get by his work, then even the highest work will become a weariness to him. I trust that your College will send forth many men so trained to do good and honest work that to do work which is bad or dishonest shall be simply impossible to them. Men like these may be proud of their trade, proud of their town; and I do not believe that we become better citizens of the world by being indifferent to the interests and honour of our own town or our own nation. I believe that the narrower patriotism is often the best way of leading us to the broader; and that the better citizen a man is of Nottingham, the better citizen will he be of England; and that the truest sons of England will make the best citizens of the world. Then it is, when a man has lived for others, has worked for public ends, that the good which he has done is not 'interred with his bones.' No! it lives after him: so that, in the words which form the proud motto of your ancient corporation,

'Vivit post funera virtus.'

In the course of some succeeding remarks, his Royal Highness said:—"There is nothing which the Royal family values more than the goodwill of their fellow-countrymen; and there is nothing they will not do, to legitimately deserve that goodwill."

The Duke of Edinburgh and the Duke of Albany, accompanied by their brother-in-law Prince Christian, took part, in a soirée at Manchester on Dec. 12, 1881, in urging the establishment of a Royal College of Music in this country, similar to the Conservatoire in France. In his address upon this occasion, the Duke of Albany dealt with the question so often repeated, "Are the English a musical nation?"

"In one sense there is already more music in England than in any other country. The most eminent artists of the Continent are to be heard here, and, indeed, do not consider their career complete until they have been here. The newest and most advanced music of the Continental schools is performed here, often before it is published. The number of public concerts in London during the season is astonishing; it far exceeds those of any foreign metropolis, and is on the increase every year. Every one who is in musical society in London knows, indeed, how much public music there is, and that, in the height and struggle of the season, it is impossible to keep pace with the public performances; and that the recitals of the best player, and concerts where both programmes and performances are alike unquestionable, will often have a thin attendance, owing to the mere impossibility of going to all. Similar facts which are familiar to us all show what a large appetite for music the Englishman has.

"With regard to the past, it is admitted by the most learned and most hostile of Continental critics that in the early discovery and practice of music England was in advance of all the nations of Europe by very many years. The round or glee 'Summer is Coming,' which is one of the musical treasures of the British Museum, is now accepted by the most learned antiquaries of England and Germany as the work of a monk of Reading, in Berkshire, in or about the year 1225. This is more than a century and a half before the admission of Dufay to the Papal chapel in 1380, which has hitherto been always taken as the earliest landmark in the history of modern music. We were a century and a half in advance of Flanders, Italy, or Germany. Moreover, this very composition, instead of being grave and dull, is far more melodious and more attractive to the unlearned hearer than any music of the corresponding period in the foreign schools. In a word, this little glee, which is the germ of modern music, the direct and absolute progenitor of the oratorios of Handel, the symphonies of Beethoven, the operas of Wagner, is a purely English creation, dealing with English sights and sounds, and is animated in a very high degree by the truly English qualities of sense, fitness, proportion, and sweet simple domestic tunefulness.

"Advance a century or two, and we shall find the same qualities still characterising the work of the English composers of the sixteenth century. Learned they are, sober, grave, religious; in these qualities they are fully abreast of their foreign contemporaries, and in some respects they are even a long way ahead of them—viz., in spirit, rhythm, melody, practical interest, and beauty. Their pieces are not learned compositions intended for only learned men, but they are in a 'tongue understood of the people.' The same spirit which gave us the Bible in our own tongue animated the musicians. The compositions of English writers of the sixteenth century, such as those of Edwards, Farrant, Retford, Birde, and the short motets of Tye—some of which compositions are familiar to those who know the excellent publications of Mr. Hullah or belong to the choral classes—these have a spirit, sense, and expression which are too often wanting in the music of the Continent at the same date. So also with the madrigal writers of England. No doubt they learned that form of composition from Italy, but while they rival the Italians in ingenuity and skill, they far surpass them in the humour, the fire, and the sense of their music. Their madrigals are not only good music; they always fit, and illustrate, and intensify the words, and go to the heart of the hearer.

"In this particular we certainly had one strong element of a musical nation. In those days, too, music was practised as an ordinary accomplishment and necessary part of an education. The writers of the sixteenth century supply many an amusing piece of evidence of the wonder and scorn with which the man was regarded who could not take his part in music as a regular element of life, and sing in a difficult madrigal or canon when put before him. In Shakspeare or Isaac Walton we find catches and songs introduced in general intercourse, so as to imply that a man of ordinary education was always able to take his part in them. Up to the seventeenth century, then, we can well claim to have been a musical nation. We started one hundred and fifty years before any other country. Our composers did not write merely for the learned, but tunefully, sensibly, for the people at large. Their object and their delight were to be sung at the fireside and round the family table; and they were sung and enjoyed in a family to their heart's content.

"But a change came. The Civil War and the great Revolution of the seventeenth century, the development of commerce, and other external events of the eighteenth century, threw the culture and energy of the country into other channels than Art, and especially than music, and gradually led to that importation and concentration of it of which I spoke before, and to its dissociation from the ordinary daily pleasures of life. This first showed itself in Handel's residence here, and the establishment of the Italian Opera by the nobility and gentry of 1715. The native school of music had been broken up, and to the rich gentry it was less trouble and more practicable to employ Handel to write operas and bring over Italian singers, than to re-establish the English school of composers and performers. Handel, however, was sensible enough to see the absurdity of thus forcing a foreign tongue on the country, and his English oratorios were his practical protest against such an anomaly. But still the mischief was done. After Handel came Haydn, who would probably have resided here, as Handel did, had he arrived earlier in life; and almost in our own days we have had a Mendelssohn.

"The Italian opera went steadily on, and reached its climax about 1850. But we must not suppose that, though the native English music was overlaid by this invasion of foreigners, it was therefore extinguished. No; the stream ran on underground, often in no weak or turbid current. First, there were the cathedrals, which always kept up the knowledge and tradition of the old church music and supplied fresh compositions. No one could forget Tallis, Birde, Farrant, Gibbons, or Purcell as long as seven services and a dozen anthems by them were sung twice in each cathedral every week. Then there were the English ballad operas to a truly surprising extent; not learned, not refined, often wanting in taste, but always melodious and spirited. Then there was the great school of glee writers who flourished from about 1750 and onwards, and produced prodigious quantities of music in a form and style peculiarly English. The Philharmonic Society was founded in 1813, the Royal Academy of Music in 1823, the Sacred Harmonic Society in 1832, and then came the movement headed by Mr. Hullah's classes in 1839, for training large bodies of persons to sing—a movement countenanced by the Government of the day, initiated by Mainzer and others, and spread more or less over all England.

"Thus we see that the succession has never failed. The torch of English music has always been handed on; and now again the same fire burns which blazed so brightly in the days of Elizabeth and James: and no one who looks at what has been happening in England in this connection during the past twenty-five or thirty years can doubt that, if properly tended and fed, this sacred flame may yet burn even more brightly and with a more radiating, beneficent and melting heat than ever before. Think of the great spread of education that has taken place since the date I last named, the increased and increasing interest in music, the establishment of so many series of concerts in London, the crowds who attend them, the help which is given by explanatory programme-books, the excellent and abundant cheap editions of Novello and others; the spirit and enterprise of the great publishing firms, almost rivalling those of Leipsic and Vienna; the many musical societies, the increase in the number of pupils at the Royal Academy of Music, the number of young English musicians who repair to the music schools abroad, the very hopeful energy at Oxford and Cambridge, the extraordinary run of musical pieces; and, lastly, the way in which music has taken its place as an ordinary topic of conversation in society. What astonishing energy, and what deep and wide love of music in the country does all this betoken! True, as I said at the outset, far too much of this is done by foreigners. The old traditions of Italian opera are too strong upon us; and we sit down quietly and think that because we do not make our own music for ourselves, therefore we cannot do it—could not do it, however much we tried. But Englishmen are in all essential qualities the same that they were in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and I am convinced that if they had proper means and methods they would become a musical nation in the best sense of the word.

"Then as to individuals. A fact which cannot fail to strike a foreigner visiting England is the ignorance of music, or rather the absolute indifference to it, on the part of men of the greatest intellect, culture, and position. It is too much a rule in England that a poet, a statesman, a theologian, a great natural philosopher, shall not only know nothing of music, but shall take no interest in it, shall dismiss it altogether from his mind as a thing entirely apart from himself, a matter of no interest or moment, a curious sort of phenomenal pleasure, and which, perhaps, he puts on the same level as dancing, and willingly abandons to ladies or idle people, as beneath the notice of an occupied or intellectual man. This, too, is rather against our credit as a musical nation. But are these things a necessity? Is it indispensable that the divinest and most impalpable of all arts, capable of affecting and exalting the soul as no other art, not even poetry, can do, should be a thing apart from the mass of our greatest and best men—should be either indulged in as a matter of fashion, or be treated as a mere pastime which has no connection with the deeper portion of the human mind? I think not. I am sure not. I am convinced that the subject only wants to be properly brought before the country. Give the people of England the opportunity to take an intelligent interest in this greatest of all civilisers, and they will embrace the opportunity. The power is not wanting; it is only the opportunity which has to be supplied. There is much both in the past and the present to encourage us in this movement."

With the above masterly review of the history of musical taste in England, which was accompanied by some remarks on the education of the German people in that delightful art, we conclude our citation of examples of the Duke of Albany's style of public speaking, and we trust that his voice will be often heard amongst us.

Princess Helen of Waldeck, Duchess of Albany.

The Princess Helen Frederica Augusta, born on Feb. 17, 1861, is eight years younger than the Duke of Albany. Carefully brought up by her parents, thoroughly domestic in her habits, and amiable in disposition, there is every prospect of the marriage being a happy one. She is the fourth daughter, now living, of the reigning Prince George Victor and Princess Helen Wilhelmina Henrietta of Waldeck-Pyrmont. The Sovereign House of Waldeck-Pyrmont is of great antiquity. Sprung from the Counts of Swalenberg, its pedigree can be clearly traced back to Witikund I., living in 1120. The family was formerly divided into two branches: that of Wildungen and that of Eisenberg. The chief of the latter, Frederick of Eisenberg, was raised in 1682 to the rank of a Prince of the Empire. He died, however, without issue, whereupon the Emperor transferred the dignity of Prince to the line of Wildungen, from which descends the present Sovereign Prince of Waldeck-Pyrmont, father of Princess Helen, Duchess of Albany. The Princes of Waldeck were recognised as Sovereigns by the Congress of Vienna. The Princess of Waldeck, mother of Princess Helen, is a daughter of the late William Duke of Nassau. The Princess has three elder sisters surviving, Princess Pauline, born Oct. 19, 1855, married last year to the Hereditary Prince of Bentheim; Princess Mary, born May 23, 1857, married in 1877 to Prince William of Wurtemberg; and Princess Adelaide, born Aug. 2, 1858, Consort of King William III. of the Netherlands. Another elder sister, Princess Sophia, died at Torquay in 1869. Her Royal Highness has only one brother, Frederick, Hereditary Prince, born Jan. 20, 1865, and one unmarried sister, Princess Elizabeth, born Sept. 6, 1873.

The population of the Waldeck-Pyrmont Principality is 54,000. The capital, Arolsen, contains 2500 inhabitants. In 1867 the government of the Principality was committed to Prussia. The Waldeck family have long been connected with that of Nassau, the junior branch of which reigns over Holland. A Prince of Waldeck commanded our Dutch allies at Fontenoy in 1745. The family are described as leading a patriarchal and simple life at the Castle of Arolsen. This place, to which we referred above, is situated on the little river Aar, a tributary of the Weser, twenty miles north of Cassel, where the Emperor Napoleon III. resided, in the Castle of Wilhelmshöhe, when captive after the surrender of Sedan. Waldeck, the larger or main portion of the Principality, lies adjacent to Nassau and Westphalia; it is a country of extensive forests, producing much timber for export, as well as cattle, marble, slate, and mineral ores. Pyrmont is a detached small district, or township, thirty miles north of the Waldeck territory, and thirty-five miles south-west of Hanover. It is inclosed between the dominions of Brunswick and Lippe-Detmold, and has an area of not more than twenty-six square miles, with a population of 7000 or 8000. The town and park are on the banks of the Emmer. The chalybeate and carbonate waters of this place have long been in repute for medicinal efficacy; they form a considerable article of export trade, and there are ten or twelve places, in the valley here, for drinking these waters. The Principality of Waldeck-Pyrmont, though under Prussian rule, has a feudal Diet of fifteen members, deputies from the nobility, the town burghers, and the present freeholders, who elect one delegate to each House of the Reichsrath, or Federal Assembly of the German Empire, at Berlin. There is a public revenue of £78,000 a year.

At the time of the Prince's engagement the following lines appeared in Punch, a tribute which expresses the cordial feeling of the nation in regard to the fair Princess who has crossed the sea to make her home amongst us:—

A SONG FOR THE ROYAL BETROTHAL.

Helen of Waldeck! Thou hast won
England's cultured and student Son;
His the part that his Father took,
Earnest ever at desk and book;
His to rule with an eager heart
Over the wide domain of Art;
Thine to aid like a loyal Wife,
All that's best in a Husband's life.

Helen of Waldeck! When our strand
Welcomes thee from the Fatherland:
When all the last farewells have rung
On thine ears in the Teuton tongue:
Trust us, thou wilt never repine
Leaving the land of haunted Rhine.
Here is a greeting, frank and free,
Waiting thee, Princess, over the sea!

SPECIAL NUMBER OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE. (THE APRIL NUMBER.)

Messrs. SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, and CO. beg to announce that the APRIL issue of HARPER'S MAGAZINE is a SPECIAL NUMBER, which they expect will rival the success of the Christmas issue.

The First Edition consists of TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND COPIES.

The Number includes 23 Contributions and over 60 Illustrations, five of them Full-Page, including three on plate paper. The variety and interest of the Papers have never, they think, been approached.

MR. WILLIAM BLACK'S New Novel, SHANDON BELLS, commences in this Number, with Full-Page Plate Illustration by Mr. W. Small. This story, of Irish scenes and journalistic London—both specially interesting subjects at the present day—will, they believe, prove to be one of the most popular of Mr. Black's novels.

Besides another strong instalment of ANNE, with Illustrations by Reinhart, there is a capital humorous tale, POOR UGRAMOGA, with 4 clever Illustrations by A. H. Frost. With these may be named IN DAYS GONE BY, a true love story from real life, with 2 Engravings from Miniatures.

MR. GLADSTONE AT HAWARDEN, written by H. W. LUCY, with Illustrations for which Mr. Gladstone has kindly furnished facilities, is a peculiarly timely and interesting paper. The Illustrations include a fine Portrait of Mr. Gladstone, Full-Page, on plate paper; Portraits of Mrs. Gladstone, W. H. and Herbert Gladstone; Mr. Gladstone in his Library; a Miniature of Gladstone when a child of two years old with his Sister; Views of old Hawarden Castle and the new Residence, and fac-simile of Mr. Gladstone's Autograph Letter to Lord Beaconsfield.

ATHENA PANTHEON, on the recent discoveries at Athens, including an Engraving of the Statue the finding of which was telegraphed by the Chief Magistrate of Athens to the Lord Mayor of London.

The only non-illustrated Paper, on WHAT WE OWE TO THE TREES, while interesting to the general reader, will be of special value in the agricultural provinces.

An Indian Poem, LOVE AND DEATH, by Mr. EDWIN ARNOLD, covering some pages, is of remarkable beauty.

Another of ROBERT HERRICK'S Poems is given in Mr. E. A. Abbey's characteristic setting of illustration. There is also a great variety of other poems.

The usual Editorial Departments are also included.

MADELINE.

By Mrs. WILLIAM OLING.

Author of "The Young Crossing-Sweepers," &c.

Crown 8vo, with 8 Illustrations, price 7s. 6d.

A NARRATIVE OF PERSONAL

EXPERIENCE DURING THE CRIMEAN WAR.

By Lady ALICE BLACKWOOD.

In now publishing her experiences and recollections of that time, Lady Blackwood has retold, with additional interest, a tale which can never lose its lessons or its power. Her book is as readable now as it would have been if published twenty years ago.—"Queen."

By BRENDA,

Author of "Froggy's Little Brother," &c.

1. WITHOUT A REFERENCE.

Small crown 8vo, with 3 Illustrations, 3s. 6d.

"One of the most cleverly constructed and touchingly told stories we have ever met with."

2. FYNIE'S FLOWER.

With 3 Illustrations, small crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

"Written with the same earnest piety which characterises the well-known works of the authoress of 'Nothing to Nobody.' When we have said that it is quite equal to its predecessors, we have given the little book sufficient recommendation."—"John Bull."

3. ESPECIALLY THOSE.

With 3 Illustrations, small crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

"A very touching little story. Will help to turn, for many, a form into a reality."—"Guardian."

"The Girl He Left Behind Him." Mezzo-Soprano or Baritone. Price 2s. net.
"I've got my pockets full of gold, I'll quit the sea," he cried;
"No more I'll roam, but stay at home, and Poll shall be my bride!"
Words by Delacour Daubigny; Music by MAX SCHROETER.

A WAYSIDE POSY. Song.
Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, or Baritone. Price 2s. net.
"They strolled across the field one sunny morn in June,
When poppies peep'd among the corn, and all things seem'd stun;
Loud buzzing were the bees, but 'love,' they say, 'is blind,'
And deaf, I think, as well, for they heard nothing of the kind."
Words and Music by MICHAEL WATSON.

TOLD IN THE TWILIGHT. Song.
Contralto or Mezzo-Soprano. Price 2s. net.
I look back to childhood's summer, and a picture comes to me,
Of an open lattice window looking out across the sea;
When a mother's arm was round me, and with voice so sweet and low,
Told me tales of childhood's dreamland in the twilight long ago.
Words by F. E. Weatherly; Music by J. L. MOLLOY.

UNDER THE LAMPLIGHT. Song.
Contralto or Mezzo-Soprano. Price 2s.
Enter the lamplight, out in the snow,
A girl sung in accents so plaintive and low,
As weary without, while within they rejoice,
She to'd her and story with tears in her voice.
Words and Music by LOUISA GRAY.

THE JESTER'S FOLLY. Song. Soprano,
Mezzo-Soprano, or Baritone. Price 2s. net.
He had tri'd himself out with his jesting,
At the Palace that festival day,
And now in the moonlight was resting,
As the madhens passed down by the way.

LIGHT-BROWN
COD-LIVER OIL.

THE PUREST. THE MOST EFFICACIOUS.
THE MOST PALATABLE. THE MOST DIGESTIBLE.
Proved by thirty years' medical experience to be THE ONLY COD-LIVER OIL which produces the full curative effects in CONSUMPTION AND DISEASES OF THE CHEST, THROAT AFFECTIONS, GENERAL DEBILITY, AND WASTING DISEASES OF CHILDREN.

SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.

SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, Bart., M.D.,
Physician to the Westminster Hospital.

"The value of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL, as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine; but, in addition, I have found it a remedy of great power in the treatment of many Affections of the Throat and Larynx, especially in Consumption of the latter, where it will sustain life when everything else fails."

DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL,
Physician Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.

"I have convinced myself that in Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr.
DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted. It was especially noted, in a large number of cases in which the patients protested they had never been able to retain or digest other Cod-Liver OIL, that Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL was not only tolerated, but taken readily, and with marked benefit."

DR. HUNTER SEMPLE,
Physician Hospital for Diseases of the Throat and Chest.

"I have long been aware of the great reputation enjoyed by the LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL introduced into medical practice by Dr. DE JONGH, and have recommended it with the utmost confidence. I have no hesitation in stating my opinion, that it possesses all the qualities of a good and efficient medicine. Its taste is by no means disagreeable, and might even be called pleasant. I have found Dr. DE JONGH'S OIL very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

JOSEPH J. POPE, Esq., M.R.C.S., Late Staff Surg., Army, Prof. of Hygiene, Birkbeck Institution.

"I found during my Indian experience that the worth and character of Dr. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL remained unchanged by tropical heat or foreign climate, and it was, from its uniformity of character, particularly adapted for long-continued administration.
The value of 'hydro-carbons' in all debilitated states of the system is now becoming generally appreciated; and it is, without doubt, upon the basis of facts, rather than from their registered statements, that we may hope to derive the greatest benefit. The OIL of Dr. DE JONGH places in everyone's reach a reliable and valuable remedy, one that cannot be too widely recognised."

DR. DE JONGH'S LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL is sold ONLY in capped IMPERIAL Half-Pints, 2s. 6d.; Pints, 4s. 6d.; Quarts, 8s.; by all respectable Chemists and Druggists throughout the World.

THE BRIDESMAIDS WAITING FOR THE BRIDE.

The Royal Wedding: Arrival of the Bride.

On Tuesday, April 25, between seven and eight in the morning, the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, which had taken on board, at Flushing, the night before, Princess Helen of Waldeck, with her parents and her younger sister and brother, arrived at Queenborough, near Sheerness, bringing the Duke of Albany's eagerly expected bride. The Royal yacht displayed the standard of Waldeck and Pyrmont flying at the main, and the English white ensigns at the fore and mizen masts. A Royal salute of twenty guns was fired by H.M.S. Penelope, and by the turret-ship Hydra, the flag-ship. A guard of honour of Royal Marines was drawn up on the jetty, and presented arms as the yacht passed up the harbour. Hearty manifestations of welcome greeted the distinguished party on board the Victoria and Albert as she came in. The men of the Penelope manned yards, and cheered, and the same sounds of welcome came from the Wildfire, Trent, and Hydra. At ten o'clock, Admiral Sir Reginald Macdonald, commander-in-chief at the Nore, with the Superintendent of Sheerness Dockyard, and other naval officials, came across to Queenborough, to welcome the Princess. A special train from Chatham brought a troop of the Royal Marine Light Infantry to form the guard of honour. The Mayor and Corporation of Queenborough, wearing their robes of office, with the Chaplain, the Vicar of Queenborough, and the Town Clerk, came on the pier, and were joined by the Mayor of Dover, the chairman of the Sittingbourne Local Board, the chairman of the Sheerness Board of Health, and the High Constable of Chatham, all in their official robes. They occupied places at the junction of the ship's gangway with the platform. There was a brilliant assembly of Naval and Military officers, amongst them Major-General Sir Evelyn Wood, V.C., K.C.B., commanding the Chatham district, his breast covered with medals and decorations, accompanied by Lady Wood. The seats reserved for the public were crowded with spectators from all parts of the country. The Kent county constabulary kept the outer circle, but excellent order and good humour prevailed.

At eleven o'clock Princess Helen came on the deck of the Royal yacht, leaning on the arm of Prince Christian, who had come from London on behalf of the Queen to welcome her Serene Highness. His Royal Highness was attended by Admiral the Hon. C. Eliot. Accompanying Princess Helen were her father and mother, their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Waldeck and Pyrmont; the Hereditary Prince Frederick, Princess Elizabeth, and the Hereditary Prince of Bentheim. Baroness Riedel, Baroness Lobell, Baron Hadeln, Baron Stockhausen, Captain Von Der Wense, Hofrath Mannel, and Hofrath Mohlmann were in attendance on the distinguished travellers; and Viscount Torrington, Lord in Waiting to her Majesty, was in attendance on their Serene Highnesses from Flushing.

The seamen and spectators gave several rounds of cheers as the Royal party emerged from the gangway. The address of welcome presented by the Mayor and Corporation of Queenborough was read by the Town Clerk.

Princess Helen listened to the reading of the address with evident interest; and when the Town Clerk had finished she said, speaking good English in clear and distinct tones:—"Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen,—I beg to thank you for the kind reception you have given to me on coming to my English home. I can assure you that I appreciate your good wishes, and you have my hearty thanks."

Prince Christian also said a few words, expressing gratification at this cordial reception. Lady Wood, and Miss Filmer, daughter of the Mayor of Queenborough, had the honour of presenting bouquets to the Princess.

As the distinguished visitors advanced up the platform to the special saloon-train waiting for them, the guard of honour presented arms, and the band played the National Anthem. Mr. Leigh Pemberton, M.P., one of the directors of the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, conducted the Princess and party to the train in readiness, which left Queenborough at half-past eleven, and passed at Clapham Junction to the South-Western Railway, reaching Windsor at half-past one o'clock. The Windsor station was gaily decorated, and a guard of honour of the Scots Guards was mounted at the terminus, with the band of the 2nd Life Guards. Assembled upon the platform were Mr. Richardson-Gardner, M.P., Mrs. Richardson-Gardner, the Mayor and Corporation of Windsor, the Recorder and Vicar, and many of the residents. The weather was extremely wet, unfortunately spoiling the effect of the festive decorations along the route.

Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, the expectant Royal bridegroom, with his sisters, Princess Louise, Princess Beatrice, Princess Christian, the Grand Duke of Hesse, and the Duke of Connaught, met Princess Helen and her parents at the station, and drove under escort to the Castle, after a stay of a few moments, during which Princess Helen and the Prince and Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont received congratulations from the Mayor of Windsor and the members of the Court in attendance.

In the first carriage were the Prince and Princess of Waldeck, Princess Helen of Waldeck, and Prince Leopold. It was raining the whole time, and the carriage was covered when driven up to the door of the station, but at the request of the Princess the hood was lowered. The second carriage contained Princess Beatrice, the Grand Duke of Hesse, Princess Waldeck, and a son of Prince Christian. Other carriages followed with the remainder of the party. The town was gaily decorated with flags and shields, and the large crowd of people, who cheered heartily, preserved excellent order. The Princess was received all along the route with acclamations of joy.

The Queen, with one of her grandchildren, received the Princess at the Royal entrance of the castle; and, after the Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont had been introduced, escorted the visitors to their apartments. The large suite of rooms, in the Lancaster Tower, which are beautifully furnished, were at the disposal of the Waldeck family during their stay at Windsor. This was the tower the Duchess of Connaught occupied previous to her marriage, and commands a view of the private grounds. The bells of Windsor pealed during and after the passage of the Royal visitors through the town.

The Marriage Ceremony.

BROOCH GIVEN BY THE BRIDEGROOM TO EACH BRIDESMAID.

Thursday morning, April 27, brought sunshine and the pleasant air of spring to betoken a promise of blessing for the Royal Wedding Day. Windsor, in the forenoon, became filled with visitors, among whom, as might be expected, were many personages of rank and distinction. A special train from Paddington brought the Ministers of State and Foreign Ambassadors at eleven o'clock. At the Windsor station they entered the Royal carriages which awaited them, and were driven to the Castle, where all was prepared for the ceremonial and festive business of the day. There was a guard of honour in the Quadrangle, formed by the Scots Guards; while in the Castle Yard, near the entrance to St. George's Chapel, was a guard of the 72nd Highlanders. The road up the Castle Hill was kept by the 1st Berkshire Volunteers, under the command of Colonel Sir R. Loyd-Lindsay. The invited visitors were received by Mr. Ponsonby Fane, and were ushered to their seats in the Chapel. Among the first was the Home Secretary, Sir William Harcourt; the Marquis of Salisbury, Sir Stafford Northcote, and Sir Richard Cross, wearing the Windsor uniform as ex-Ministers, appeared soon afterwards; then the Prime Minister, also in Windsor uniform, Earl Spencer, Lord President of the Council, Earl Granville and Lord Hartington, two of the Secretaries of State, and Mr. Bright in a plain suit of black velvet. Many ladies were early seen in the assembly, which had a very splendid aspect, from the bright and rich colours of their dresses, and of the military and official uniforms.

The Knights' stalls on the southern side of the choir were occupied in the following order:—Lord Chancellor, Lady Selborne, Mr. Gladstone, Mrs. Gladstone, Earl Spencer, Countess Spencer, Duke of Richmond, Duchess of Richmond, Duchess of Wellington, Duke of Wellington, Duke of Bedford, Duke of Norfolk, Duke of Argyll, Duke of Portland, Vikar-ool-Oomra, Marquis of Hartington, Lord Carlingford, Earl of Kimberley, Countess of Kimberley, Earl of Northbrook, Mr. W. E. Forster, Mr. John Bright, Mr. Dodson, Mr. O. Morgan, Viscount Bridport, Colonel Maude, Sir H. Keppel, Lord Aveland, Earl of Fife. The Sovereign's stall remained vacant.

On the northern side, the Knights' stalls were occupied in the following order:—The Turkish Ambassador, Mdle. Musurus, German Ambassador, Countess Marie Münster, Italian Ambassador, Countess Menabrea, Austrian Ambassador, Countess Karolyi, Russian Ambassador, French Ambassador, Countess Bylandt, Netherlands Minister, Belgian Minister, Portuguese Minister, Swedish Minister, Danish Secretary, Earl Granville, Countess Granville, Marquis of Salisbury, Marchioness of Salisbury, Sir W. Harcourt, Lady Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Lord Harris, Lord Methuen, Lord Rowton, Lord Charles Fitzroy, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Fawcett.

In the pews and seats on the right-hand side were several of the ladies and gentlemen in attendance, and, of the guests, including the Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry, the Dowager Marchioness of Ormonde, the Earl and Countess of Crawford, the Earl and Countess of Hardwicke, the Countess of Breadalbane, the Earl and Countess of Rosslyn, Countess Gleichen and Countess F. Gleichen, Count E. Gleichen, the Dean of Christchurch and Mrs. Liddell, Lady Lindsay, Sir R. and Lady Knightley, Lords R. Gower and A. Campbell, Sir Garnet Wolseley, Generals Herbert and Whitman, and Sir J. Grant.

Among the guests in the corresponding seats on the other side were the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, Marquis and Marchioness of Hertford, Earl and Countess of Lathom, Lord and Lady Leamington, Sir A. and Lady Campbell, Sir Stafford and Lady Northcote, Sir R. Cross, Hon. S. and Lady Beatrix Herbert, Sir T. Martin, Count Schimmelpenninck, the Earl of Dalhousie, Lord Sackville, Lord Monson, Lord Kensington, Sir F. Seymour, Mr. and Mrs. Coleridge Kennard, and the Mayor of Windsor.

The scene presented by the nave when all the places were filled was exceedingly bright and animated. The Gentlemen-at-Arms in their scarlet uniform and white-plumed helmets were stationed at the western entrance, while the Yeoman of the Guard in their picturesque costume stood, halberts in hand, on each side of the nave.

At a quarter to twelve o'clock the Most Rev. the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Right Rev. the Bishops of London, Winchester, Oxford, and Worcester, the Hon. and Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor, and the other clergymen who were to assist in the religious ceremony, entered the choir and took their places within the rails of the altar.

The time for the arrival of the procession of the Royal Family and guests had come, and there was a hush of expectation among the company. They had not long to wait, but in the meantime the organ pealed forth a festal march with triumphal accompaniment, composed by Sir G. Elvey. At five minutes past twelve her Majesty's state trumpeters stationed at the west entrance to the Chapel announced by a flourish of trumpets the entrance of the first procession, and a wedding march, composed for the occasion by Sir G. Elvey, was played on the organ as the Royal personages moved up the Chapel.

The Heralds, in their blazoned tabards, came first, followed by several noblemen and gentlemen of her Majesty's Household, and after them came his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar and his Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Bentheim. The company rose to greet his Serene Highness the Duke of Teck and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Teck, whose train was borne by the Hon. Miss Thesiger, and who was attended by Major-General Fulke-Greville. The Duke of Teck wore an Austrian uniform, and the other two Princes were also in military dress. Then came their Royal Highnesses Prince Philip and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, in the uniform of a Field Marshal, and her Royal Highness Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne. Lady Sophia Macnamara bore the train of her Royal Highness.

Their Royal Highnesses Prince and Princess Christian, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, with their youthful son in Highland costume, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz (the Grand Duke was prevented by indisposition from attending), her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales, her Serene Highness the reigning Princess of Waldeck and Pyrmont, followed in the above order; and the procession was closed by the Hereditary Prince of Waldeck and Pyrmont and her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, brother and sister of the bride. The Princess of Wales, who was accompanied by her three daughters, Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, acknowledged by bowing frequently the respectful salutations which she received. The dress of her Royal Highness was of the palest blue brocade, embossed with flowers and trimmed with silver. The jupe was of antique satin, over which fell a cloud of fine Brussels lace, bearing her Royal Highness's coronet and monogram. The train of brocade, also richly trimmed with silver and lace, was borne by the Countess of Morton and Miss Knollys. Her Royal Highness wore a diamond necklace of great value. The young Princesses were attired in dresses of the palest blue satin, trimmed in crêpe lisse tied with broad sashes of brocade. Her Royal Highness was supporters standing near her, while the Bridesmaids formed a group behind her, the Lord Chamberlain and the Vice-Chamberlain standing near.

All being now in readiness for the marriage ceremony, the Archbishop proceeded to perform the service. Precisely at this moment the sunlight streamed in through the stained-glass windows, imparting singular beauty to the gorgeous scene. The Archbishop's voice was rather indistinctly heard, but the responses of the Bride were made with remarkable clearness, and in a low sweet tone. The replies of the Bridegroom were not so distinctly audible. The Bride was given away by her father; the Bridegroom placed the ring on her finger, and at twenty minutes past one the solemn ceremony was completed. At the conclusion of the service Beethoven's "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung with grand effect by the choir. The Duke of Albany led his wife to the Queen, who took her new daughter in her arms, and kissed her on both cheeks. The Prince and Princess of Waldeck next embraced their daughter. The Bride and Bridegroom then left the dais, and, the procession being re-formed, went down the choir and nave in the reverse order to that in which it had entered. The Duchess of Albany looked pleased and happy, and smiled and bowed right and left in response to the respectful salutations of the company. Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" was played on the organ as the procession passed through the nave and out at the western door.

The guns in the Long Walk boomed forth a Royal salute in token that the nuptial rites had been celebrated. At a quarter past one the guards of honour and escorts were called to attention for the returning processions, which began with the carriage containing the Bride and Bridegroom. Again the cheers of the assembled multitude burst forth, and the long line of waving hats and handkerchiefs expressed the kindest popular feeling towards the newly-wedded pair. Her Majesty the Queen and the members of the Royal Family received an equal demonstration of affectionate loyalty.

On their return to the Castle, the Register of the Marriage was signed by the Bride and Bridegroom, and was duly attested by her Majesty the Queen and by the other Royal and distinguished personages invited to attend for that purpose in the Green Drawing-Room.

The Queen, with the Bride and Bridegroom and the other Royal personages, then proceeded to the Grand Reception-Room, where her Majesty received the guests invited to the ceremony. The déjeûner was privately served for the Queen, the Royal Family, and the Royal guests in the Dining-Room; and for her Majesty's other guests in the Waterloo Gallery, where the Lord Steward gave the following toasts:—"The Bride and Bridegroom," and "The Queen." The band of the 2nd Life Guards played some music during the entertainment.

At a quarter past four the Duke and Duchess of Albany took their departure from the Castle, the Queen accompanying them to the entrance, and waving her handkerchief as they drove away amid a shower of rice and satin slippers, betokening the good wishes of their Royal relatives; while the bands in the Quadrangle played "God Save the Queen" and the Waldeck national hymn. The Royal Pair drove slowly down the Castle Hill in an open landau, drawn by four greys, with postilions and outriders, accompanied by an escort of the 2nd Life Guards. They passed between lines of cheering spectators through the town and into the Long Walk, which was crowded for a considerable distance. At Old Windsor, opposite the Royal Windsor Tapestry Manufactory, of which the Duke of Albany is the President, the Director, Mr. Henry, had erected a fine triumphal arch, under which the Royal Couple passed in their carriage, while a little French girl, three years old, the child of M. Francillon, one of the workpeople, was held in Mr. Henry's arms to present a bouquet of flowers to her Royal Highness. Another bouquet was presented to her by Lady Brett, at Esher.

The Queen and Princess Beatrice and other members of the Royal Family drove through Windsor to see the decorations, returning to the Castle about half-past five in the evening.

Her Majesty gave a state banquet in St. George's Hall in honour of the Royal Marriage, covers being laid for over a hundred guests. The Banquet-Hall presented a truly regal appearance upon this occasion. The stately apartment, which is hung with the banners of the first twenty-six Knights of the Garter, and decorated on the ceiling and side walls with the arms of every Knight since the creation of the Order, in 1350, by King Edward III., showed to great advantage during the entertainment. The table, which was covered with white damask, was decked with the splendid gold dinner service belonging to the Queen, and richly chased gold candelabra filled with lighted wax candles and interspersed with mirrors cased in gold. At each end of the long dining-table there was a buffet, and displayed upon the crimson covers were the plateaux, vases, and candelabra forming the Royal collection of gold plate, valued at two millions sterling. The sideboard at the east end of the room was adorned with the gold lyre-bird, studded with £30,000 worth of rubies, emeralds, diamonds, and pearls, which, as well as the tiger's-head footstool of silver-gilt, with crystal tusks and gold tongue, valued at £10,000, exhibited on the same buffet, was captured from Tippoo Saib by Lord Mornington in 1800. The hall was lighted on each side by three lamps attached to shields on the walls. Her Majesty sat at the centre of the table, with her Royal and other guests to the right and left of her chair, and opposite. The company included the King and Queen of Holland, the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), Princess Beatrice, Prince and Princess Christian, the Prince and Princess of Waldeck, the Hereditary Prince, Princess Elizabeth, and most of the Queen's guests invited to the Wedding.

Arrival at Claremont.

About one mile south of the village of Esher, in Surrey, and fourteen miles from London, is Claremont, a park and mansion belonging to the Queen, which has of late years been lent by her Majesty to Prince Leopold for his ordinary residence.

The newly-married Royal Pair arrived at Esher at six o'clock in the evening. The inhabitants of that village had erected, under the direction of Mr. F. J. Williamson, sculptor, a series of beautiful arches, composed of foliage and flowers, constructed by Messrs. Garrod and Pratt, with a charming floral pavilion at the turning to the lane which leads to Claremont. Here the Rector of the parish, the Rev. S. L. Warren, with a number of the resident ladies and gentlemen, presented to the Duke of Albany their address of congratulation upon his marriage. His Royal Highness made the following reply:—"On behalf of the Duchess of Albany and myself, I beg to return you my true and heartfelt thanks for the kind terms in which you have welcomed us to our home. We both feel the greatest satisfaction in the thought that the first days of our married life will be spent in the parish of Esher, for it is here that we shall hope for the future to centre our local cares and interests. I willingly accept the splendid reception that you have accorded us to-day as a proof of the friendly regard which my neighbours here entertain for me, and which, I am confident, they will now extend to the Duchess also. We congratulate ourselves on possessing Claremont as a residence; and, should Providence see fit to prolong our lives, we hopefully anticipate spending the greater portion of our days here."

We terminate our account of the Royal Wedding, by leaving the Duke and Duchess of Albany in their own home at Claremont. It only remains that we should, in reference to the Portraits which we are enabled to give of their Royal Highnesses, and of the eight Bridesmaids, acknowledge the indispensable aid of the skilful photographic artists. Our Engraving on page 28, entitled "The Royal Pair," is from a photograph specially taken for the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS by Mr. J. Thomson, of Buckingham Palace-road, photographer to the Queen. The Portrait of Lady Erymtrude Russell is from one by Mr. A. Bassano, Old Bond-street; also that of Lady Florence Bootle-Wilbraham; Lady Alexandrina Vane Tempest, by Messrs. W. and D. Downey, of Ebury-street; Lady Feodora Yorke, by Mr. J. Thomson; Lady Florence Anson, by Messrs. Window and Grove, Baker-street; Lady Anne Lindsay, by the Fotografia Montabone, at Florence. That of Lady Blanche Butler is from a miniature painting.

THE WEDDING CEREMONY 1

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.

The Royal Wedding.

DRESSES OF THE BRIDE AND BRIDESMAIDS.

Princess Helen's wedding dress was one of the most novel and exquisite creations imaginable; and it is difficult to understand how it can have been so elaborately made, and could yet look as though it had never been touched by hands. It came from the atelier (being a true work of art) of Madame Corbay, of Paris, and was entirely of rich white satin. The skirt had small openings near the bottom, through which masses of orange-blossom and myrtle could be seen. It was trimmed with two robings of point d'Alençon lace, which were turned off with square corners, to lose themselves in the garnitures of the long train, which was flaked with silver and embroidered with large bunches of silver fleurs-de-lys, standing out in relief. It was bordered with white satin ruchings and point d'Alençon lace. On the whole, it forms quite a new point of departure in the style of wedding dresses.

The costumes made by Mrs Stratton for Princess Helen's eight bridesmaids were exquisitely simple in design, though of the richest material, made specially for them at Lyons. A beautiful little model was prepared and sent down to Windsor for the Queen and Princess Beatrice to see and approve before they went to Mentone; and so delighted was Princess Beatrice with this small work of art that she asked to have it reserved and sent to her after the dresses were completed. They were composed of thick white satin and moiré Française, the petticoats being of the former and the bodices and trains of the latter material. The jupes were edged at the bottom with tiny scollops, less than an inch in width, and ornamented with two flounces of pearled net. The pearls were sewn on in threes, with a scroll-like border; and each flounce was headed with bouquets of primroses, violets, and white heather. Six bouquets were placed above the first, and five over the second; and they were connected by graceful festoons of four violets, with exquisitely shaded leaves, and a perfect fringe of the white heather. The moiré bodices had long points before and behind, and were adorned with stomachers of pearled net, matching the flounces. In the centre, on the breast, was a bouquet of the same flowers as on the skirt, with one on each side, which were also connected by festoons, one of which ran over the top of each sleeve. The sleeves consisted of a single small puff, gauged so as to finish off with a little frill. The trains were of moderate length, and fell in the simplest folds to the ground, after being draped to form paniers over the hips. Their only garniture was a series of small box plaits, each of which was gauged in the centre, and gave the effect of small bows. The coiffures were extremely simple, with curled fringes, which did not conceal the brows, and the hair plaited rather low in the neck behind. A small wreath, or rather a couple of tufts of flowers, like those on the dresses, with tulle veils, was worn on the head. Each lady had two rows of pearls round her throat, very long gloves, and shoes with tiny pearl buckles; and carried a bouquet of violets, primroses, and white heather.

The bride's travelling-dress, in which the newly-married Duchess of Albany drove from Windsor to Claremont, was made by Mrs. Mason; it was of ivory-coloured stamped velvet, over a petticoat of white moiré, both finished with a single flounce of lace, and the velvet having some soft chenille fringe in addition. A pretty bodice, trimmed with lace, was so arranged that the basque formed a species of small panier; and it had comfortable coat-sleeves. There was a cloak to match, trimmed with marabout and chenille; and the whole toilette was one that combined lightness and warmth. The bonnet worn with it was a present from the Queen, and was made by Mesdames Perryman and Parsons, of ivory chip trimmed with white grenat, and with a wreath of myrtle, jasmine, and orange-blossom.

A charming dinner dress, also presented by her Majesty to the bride, was an exquisite blending of pale turquoise blue and white lace, just relieved and heightened by a touch of the palest primrose. The jupe was of blue satin, almost covered with Honiton lace, six inches wide, made in Devonshire on purpose. Down the centre was a slight opening, edged with passementerie of pearl beads and gold filigree, in a pine pattern; and under this the primrose satin was just seen. A narrow plissé of the same ran round the bottom; and the train of blue velvet brocade was lined with the same colour. The low corsage and sleeves were trimmed with pearl and gold embroidery; and a shoulder-knot of pale yellow roses was placed on the left side. Both this dress, and the one worn at the wedding by Princess Beatrice, were the work of Mrs. Stratton.

THE WEDDING GIFTS.

In the White Drawing-room of Windsor Castle, a day or two before the Royal Wedding-day, were set out to view, for the admiration and gratification of her Majesty's guests, the collection of costly and beautiful wedding gifts, some of which are represented among our minor illustrations. The first object seen to the right hand, on entering the room, was one of the Queen's presents—the portrait of Princess Helen herself, admirably painted by Carl Sohn, jun., a rising artist of the Düsseldorf School. In the middle of the long table extending down the room was the superb golden bowl presented by Sir Nathaniel de Rothschild; on the round table, in front of the great malachite vase, was the large silver centrepiece forming part of the gift of Scotch noblemen and gentlemen, friends of the bridegroom. Another stately gift was the pair of chased silver candelabra, weighing 445 ounces, presented by the members of the Christ Church Society of Oxford. The Bachelors' Club presented a handsome dressing-case, and the Earl of Aberdeen a pair of silver honey-pails of the Scottish pattern. Mr. Christopher Sykes gave a magnificent antique silver box, and the Duchess of Wellington a grand clock, by Lecluse. A prominent object was the immense silver bowl from the Wiltshire Society; and there was a Russian liqueur case, with cups instead of glasses, given to his brother by the Duke of Edinburgh. Near the Scotch centrepiece was a fine plaque from Sir Albert Sassoon, with a pair of handsome painted dishes from the Duchess of Connaught's household. Mrs. Wemyss presented a beautiful gold cup, Sir Theodore Martin an exquisitely-carved Augsburg cup, and Lady Martin a Bible in an antique silver case of great beauty. Lord Rowton's offering was quaint and curious, being the signet-rings to the draught of the Treaty of Berlin handsomely framed and glazed. Mr. Gladstone sent a copy of "Gleanings of Past Years," with a dedication as follows:—"Humbly presented by the author to H.R.H. Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, on his marriage, with respectful but hearty congratulations and good wishes. London, April, 1882."

Among the other presents were a beautifully-framed mirror from Sir W. and Lady Brett, a curious silver box from Lord and Lady Lovelace, an antique silver flagon from Colonel and Mrs. Napier Sturt, a superb silver inkstand and candlesticks from the Marquis of Tavistock, a curious piece of old silver-work from Captain and Mrs. Arthur Paget, an elegant flagon from the servants at Claremont, a gold tea equipage from Lady Molesworth, an antique silver bowl from Mr. and Mrs. Jeune, a splendid silver dish from the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury, a golden bowl from the Earl and Countess of Bradford, a pair of silver vinaigrettes from Lord and Lady Reay, a fine old silver cake-basket from Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, Venetian glass from Count and Countess Gleichen, some exquisite lace from Mrs. Coleridge Kennard, some needlework from Lady Charlotte Schreiber, a silver toilet set from Viscountess Dalrymple, quaint silver candlesticks from Earl and Countess Kilmorey, silver coin cups from the Earl and Countess of Lathom, silver castors from Mr. F. Arkwright, and a peacock-feather fan in a tortoise-shell frame, with a coronet and "Helen" in diamonds.

We proceed to notice more particularly a few of the Wedding Gifts, shown in the illustrations we have engraved:—

A bracelet and ring, in a handsome velvet case, form the present from the inhabitants of Windsor to the bride. The bracelet is in the form of a three-coil serpent, with a large sapphire in its head, the body being formed by 320 brilliants, weighing together 24½ carats. The ring is a half-hoop of five-stone diamonds, the stones being slightly graduated in size, and of very fine quality. On the outside of the case is an inscription recording the gift. The whole is of exquisite design and workmanship, representing nearly £500 in value. It was supplied by Mr. C. W. Seymour, goldsmith, of High-street, Windsor.

The eight bridesmaids' brooches, given them by the bridegroom, have centres composed of the monogram "L. H." in diamonds and sapphires, surmounted by a coronet with rubies and sapphires and diamonds; a diamond arrow intersects the monogram. These brooches were made by Mr. John Brogden, of Charing-cross, art goldsmith to his Royal Highness.

A silver casket was presented to the Duke of Albany, as Provincial Grand Master of Oxfordshire, by the Masonic Brethren of the province. This casket is of Gothic design, in silver partially gilt, and is placed on a shaped and ornamental ebony stand, elegantly carved. The front panel bears, in raised enamel, the Grand Master's collar and jewel. On the reverse side are the arms of his Royal Highness. At each corner are the Royal supporters, and the casket is surmounted by the coronet of his Royal Highness, resting on a cushion. At each end is a raised medallion, with inscriptions stating from whom the casket is presented. It was manufactured by Messrs. Ormer and Houle, of St. James's-street.

The Wiltshire Freemasons, with whom Prince Leopold was associated during his residence at Bayton Manor, had given him a pair of richly chased silver beakers, embellished with flowers and pomegranates, standing sixteen inches high. The beakers or vases are engraved round the edge with the simple inscription, "From the Freemasons of Wiltshire." These were manufactured by Messrs. Lambert, of Coventry-street.

The friends of his Royal Highness residing at the University of Oxford had forwarded for the acceptance of the Prince a wedding present, consisting of a beautifully-designed set of old silver-mounted ornaments for the writing-table. The set comprises, besides inkstand, mirror, and candlesticks, an album bound in silver, containing the autographs of the subscribers, and a silver frame inclosing the portrait of the bride. The mounting of the blotting-case is in dark blue velvet, bound with bands of old silver, delicately chased with figures and foliage. The articles, which were selected and arranged by Mrs. Liddell and Mrs. Max Müller, were inclosed in a case lined with primrose satin.

One of the most artistic of these gifts was a plaque, of silver repoussé work, the design of which was copied from one of the pieces of tapestry, made at the Royal Windsor Tapestry Manufactory, which adorned the Pavilion erected for the Prince of Wales at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, and which gained an Exhibition Gold Medal. Its subject is "The Merry Wives of Windsor." The tapestry belongs to Sir Albert Sassoon, who had caused this plaque to be executed by M. Morel-Ladeuil, the well-known artist in the employ of Messrs. Elkington and Co., and had presented it to his Royal Highness the Duke of Albany. The design itself is in oxydised silver; the border of the plaque is of iron, damascened with gold and silver; and the arms of his Royal Highness are emblazoned in coloured enamels. Her Majesty especially requested that this work might be sent to Windsor for her inspection.

The tapestried arm-chair presented by the director and the employés of the Royal Windsor Tapestry Works to the Duke of Albany is a good specimen of artistic furniture. The panel on the back contains the initials "L. H.," supported by Cupids, surmounted by a coronet, and adorned with violets and other flowers, while a miniature view of Windsor Castle, surrounded by a wreath, is worked upon the seat. The carved frame of the chair, which is in the Louis XVI. style, is gilt.

The employés of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, pianoforte makers, had presented to their Royal Highnesses a grand oblique pianoforte, in a very handsome ebonised case, decorated in Adams's style. It is 7½ octaves in compass, and contains all the recent improvements of the firm, including a third pedal that produces most melodious effects, the sound being sustained to an almost indefinite length of time.

A wedding-cake for the breakfast was manufactured by Messrs. Bolland and Sons, of Chester, who have similarly provided for the Royal marriage feast on some previous occasions. "It is built in three tiers; at the base are swans and dolphins swimming in imitation water. The first tier is ornamented with four medallion groups—Europe, Asia, Africa, America—separated by pillars on which are painted the lily upon satin. On the pillars are vases filled with flowers emblematic of the United Kingdom. Cupids, reading, support a figure of Literature. The second tier is octagonal in form. Medallions bear the arms of England and Waldeck and the Royal monograms. On pillars are orange-blossoms and trophies of love, and Cupids shower imitation water on flowers. The third tier bears a fountain with doves, encircled by ornamental pillars, festooned with wedding favours. The whole is surmounted by a vase containing a bouquet of flowers. The cake, which rises 6 ft. high, and weighs 2 cwt., rests upon a golden stand." The principal wedding-cake for the Royal table was supplied by Messrs. Gunter and Co., of Berkeley-square, her Majesty's own household confectioner. The health of the bride and bridegroom was drunk in Wachter's "Royal Charter" champagne.

Messrs. Defries and Sons, of Houndsditch, were intrusted with the decorations and illuminations at Windsor, Esher, Surbiton, and Sandown Park on this festive occasion. Magnificent crystal medallions and other devices, with monograms of the bride and bridegroom, were specially manufactured for the occasion. A display of these handsome devices was exhibited on several of the important buildings in various parts of the town of Windsor. At Esher and Surbiton similar illuminations were fixed. Sandown Park was illuminated with the new æsthetic lamps, which produced a most charming effect. At Esher a grand display of fireworks was given, with set pieces of appropriate mottoes and devices. These preparations were most successfully carried into effect.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey or white, or falling off, use THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER; for it will positively restore, in every case, grey or white hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair characteristically beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed.
This preparation has never been known to fail in restoring the hair to its natural colour and gloss in from eight to twelve days. It promotes growth, and prevents the hair falling out, eradicating dandruff, and leaving the scalp in a clean, healthy condition.
It imparts peculiar vitality to the roots of the hair, restoring it to its youthful freshness and vigour. Daily applications of this preparation for a week or two will surely restore faded, grey, or white hair to its natural colour and richness.
It is not a dye, nor does it contain any colouring matter or offensive substance whatever. Hence it does not soil the hands, the scalp, or even white linen, but produces the colour within the substance of the hair.
It may be had of any respectable Chemist, Perfumer, or Dealer in Toilet Articles in the Kingdom, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the dealer has not "The Mexican Hair Renewer" in stock and will not procure it for you, it will be sent direct by rail, carriage-paid, on receipt of 4s. in stamps, to any part of England. Sold Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, 33, Farringdon-road, London.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

WHAT BEAUTIFIES THE HAIR?
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And plumes each one's fancied
What adds a charm of perfect grace,
And Nature's gift enhances,
What gives a bright and beautiful gloss,
And what says each reviewer,
"That quite successful is the use OF 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it bright and glowing?
What keeps it free from dandruff, too,
And healthy in its growing?
What does such wonders? Ask the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"The none can equal or approach
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
Like some bright halo beaming?
What makes the hair a perfect mass
Of splendid ringlets teeming?
What gives profusion in excess?
"Why, what says each reviewer?
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it so dear to the heart,
Because to speak the honest truth
Is only just and right?
What says the people and the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That most superb for ladies use Is 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

has gained for itself the highest reputation, and a decided preference over all other "hair dressings," as evinced from certificates and testimonials from the most respectable sources. Being combined with the greatest care, containing, as it does, all the most desirable qualities of the best hair preparations of the day, without the objectionable ones—it may be relied on as the very best known to chemistry for restoring the natural colour to the hair, and causing it to grow on bald spots, unless the hair glands are decayed; for, if the glands are decayed and gone, no stimulant can restore them; but, as is left in the case, the glands are only torpid, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER will renew their vitality, and a new growth of hair will follow, freed from itching, itching, itching.
From Messrs. Wm. Hayes and Co., Chemists, 12, Grafton-street, Dublin:—"We are recommending THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER to all our customers as the best of the kind, as we have been long and successfully using it, and find that it has a wonderful effect in restoring and strengthening their hair."

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

AN IMPORTANT QUESTION FOR LADIES.

Would you have luxuriant hair,
Beautiful, and rich, and rare?
Would you have it soft and bright,
And attractive to the sight?
This you really can produce
If you put in constant use
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
The hair it strengthens and preserves,
And thus a double purpose serves;
It beautifies—improves it, too,
And gives it a most charming hue,
And thus in each essential way,
It public favour gains each day—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
If a single thread of hair
Of a greyish tint is there,
"The Renewer" will restore
All its colour as before,
And thus it is that vast renown—
Does daily now its virtue crown—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

No matter whether faded grey,
Or falling like the leaves away,
It will renew the human hair,
And make it like itself appear:
It will revive it, beautify it,
And every ardent wish supply—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

The constitution of the person and the condition of the scalp have much to do with the length of time it requires for new hair to grow; also thin or thick hair will depend much upon the vital force remaining in the hair-glands. New hairs are first seen to start around the margin of the bald spots near the permanent hair, and extending upwards until the spots are covered more or less thickly with the short hair. And thus it is that vast renown—Does daily now its virtue crown—THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
On applying this hair-dressing it enlivens the scalp, and in cases where the hair begins to fall a few applications will arrest it, and the new growth presents the luxuriance and colour of youth. It is relied on by the hair-dressing known for restoring grey or faded hair to its original colour without dyeing it, producing the colour within the substance of the hair, imparting a peculiar vitality to the roots, preventing the hair from falling, keeping the head cool, clean, and free from dandruff, causing new hair to grow, unless the hair-glands are entirely decayed. THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER makes the hair soft, glossy, and luxuriant. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers, at 3s. 6d.; or sent to any address free on receipt of 4s. in stamps.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

When the hair is weak and faded,
Like the autumn leaves that fall,
Then is felt that sudden feeling
Which does every heart enthrall.
Then we look for some specific
To arrest it on its way,
And THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Bids it like enchantment stay.
It arrests decaying progress:
Though the hair is thin and grey
It will strengthen and improve it,
And work wonders day by day.
It restores the colour,
And brings back its beauty, too;
For THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Makes it look both fresh and new.
What's the greatest hair restorer
That the present age can show?
What produces wonders daily,
Which the world at large should know?
Why, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Eminently stands the first:
Thus its fame by countless thousands
Day by day is now rehearsed.
What beautifies, improves, and strengthens
Human hair of every age?
Why, this famous great restorer
Which the ladies prize so true,
And THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER
Is the very best in use.
For luxuriant tresses 'tways
Do its magic powers produce.

THE WORDS "THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER" are a Trade Mark; and the public will please see the words are on every case surrounding the Bottle, and the name is blown in the bottle.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER. Price 3s. 6d. Directions in German, French, and Spanish.
May be had of most respectable Dealers in all parts of the World.
Sold Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, 33, Farringdon-road, London.

READ THESE GENUINE and UNIMPEACHABLE TESTIMONIALS.

PEARS' SOAP.—Prof. Erasmus Wilson, F.R.S., Professor of Dermatology, President of the Royal Society of Surgeons in England, in the "Journal of Cutaneous Medicine," writes:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"The use of a good soap is certainly calculated to preserve the skin in health, to maintain its complexion and tone, and prevent its falling into wrinkles. Pears is a name engraven on the memory of the 'oldest inhabitant.' Pears' Soap is an article of the most and most careful manufacture, and the most refreshing and agreeable of balms for the skin."

PEARS' SOAP.—Dr. Tilbury Fox, late Physician to the Skin Department, University College Hospital, writes:—

PEARS' SOAP "is the best soap made."—Vide Tilbury Fox on the "Skin," p. 40.

PEARS' SOAP.—"The Skin and Complexion. From 'Punch.'—A lay from the 'Lancet.'—'Bad complexions, blotchy and rough skins, deficient eyebrows and eyelashes are becoming common characteristics, not only of the frivolous or dissipated classes, but of the respectable and sedate community as a whole.'"

PEARS' SOAP is a wonderfully pure Soap.—Lancet, Sept. 17, 1881.

PEARS' SOAP.
"No wonder that muddy complexions increase, And that eye-lids and eye-lashes vanish away. But we turn to our 'Lancet' and that gives us peace. If we follow the rules that it has given to-day, Let vile nostrums alone, or alabaster all lay. Of a face without blotches and rubicund nose; But just stick to pure water and plenty of soap. And you'll find your complexion as fresh as a rose."—"Punch," Oct. 1, 1881.

PEARS' SOAP.—"Of the many soaps I have tried, the only one I can really recommend is Pears' Transparent Soap, which has been on trial at our Hospital for more than seven years, and has been ordered by myself alone in upwards of 1,000 cases, with uniformly satisfactory results. It has reached the highest attainable purity, and is the very monarch of toilet soaps."—John L. Morton, Senior Surgeon St. John's Hospital for the Skin, London.

PEARS' SOAP.—Mr. James Startin, late Physician to St. John's Hospital for the Skin, London, writes:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"For many years I have had the pleasure in recommending and using Pears' Soap in preference to every other, as being perfectly free from those impurities so prejudicial to the skin found in most soaps."

PEARS' SOAP.—Mr. James Startin, Surgeon and Lecturer at St. John's Hospital for the Skin, London, writes:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"As to the soap you should use: Having made innumerable experiments with all the best-known toilet soaps, both of English and Continental makers, my experience is in favour of Pears' Soap, and I can certify that it is the best of its kind. I have used it for many years, and I have invariably found it perfectly pure, and the most efficacious in health and disease, and hence I recommend it to patients in preference to all others."

PEARS' SOAP.—H. S. Purdon, Esq., M.D., Physician to the Belfast Skin Hospital, writes:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"The best soap I know is Pears' Transparent Soap, and I recommend it to patients and friends."

PEARS' SOAP.—Dr. Redwood, Professor of Chemistry and Pharmacy to the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, reports:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"Messrs. Pears have long been celebrated for their Transparent Soap, and from frequent examinations and analyses of it during a period of thirty years, I can certify that it possesses the properties of an efficient yet mild detergent, without any of the objectionable properties of ordinary soaps, which contain free fatty acids, or caustic alkali, or a saline salt, giving them a greasy, acrid, or irritating character. It is quite free from coconut oil and artificial colouring matter, and may be relied upon for great purity, uniformity of composition, and agreeable perfume. It may be represented as a perfect toilet soap."

PEARS' SOAP.—C. R. C. Tichborne, Esq., LL.D., Lecturer on Chemistry at Carmichael College of Medicine, Dublin, reports:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"I have made three separate and independent analyses of Pears' Transparent Soap, the samples being procured by myself at ordinary retail shops, and from these examinations I am able to certify to its purity. It is made in the most perfect manner, and is free from any causticity—to persons of delicate skin a question of vital importance. Being free from all adulteration with water, its durability is really remarkable. I cannot speak too highly of it, for it strikingly illustrates the perfection of toilet soap. Within the last few years a great number of transparent soaps, imitations of Messrs. Pears' invention, have appeared in the market, of most inferior and injurious character, consisting of coconut oil, glycerine, and a large addition of water, and I have found in them over 50 per cent of free caustic soda, and nearly one-third water. I need hardly say that such soaps are necessarily most hurtful."

PEARS' SOAP.—Professor Attfield, F.R.S., Professor of Practical Chemistry to the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, reports:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"I have annually, for the past ten years, made an independent analysis of your Transparent Soap, and have not found it to vary in quality or in composition. It contains neither excess of alkali nor of moisture, and it is free from artificial colouring matter. A better, purer, or more usefully durable soap cannot be made."

PEARS' SOAP.—Professor Cameron, M.D., &c., Professor of Chemistry and Hygiene in the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland, and Medical Officer of Health and Analyst for Dublin, reports:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"I have analysed samples of Pears' Soap, purchased by myself in Dublin. I find it remarkably good—prepared from pure materials, combined in the proper proportions, and free from coconut oil and from artificial colouring. It may safely be used upon the skin of the tenderest infant."

PEARS' SOAP.—S. McAdam, Esq., Ph.D., &c., Lecturer on Chemistry, Surgeons' Hall, Edinburgh, reports:—

PEARS' SOAP.—"I have made careful analyses of several tablets of Pears' Transparent Soap, which I obtained indiscriminately at different shops in Edinburgh, and I can certify that it is a pure and genuine soap, free from admixture with any foreign substances, and practically devoid of causticity. It combines detergent with emollient properties in a high degree, and it may therefore be used with great advantage for toilet and bath purposes, especially in the case of children and others whose skin is soft and delicate and liable to be affected by the impure and caustic nature of ordinary soaps."

PEARS' SOAP.—For Toilet.

PEARS' SOAP.—For Nursery.

PEARS' SOAP.—For Shaving.

PEARS' SOAP.—For Washing. Tablets and Balls, 1s. each; Larger Sizes, 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. (the 2s. 6d. Tablet is perfumed with Otto of Rose). A smaller Tablet (unscented) is sold at 6d.

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet tooth-brush produce a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the Teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable, and equally adapted to old and young.

The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly by gentlemen after smoking. The Floriline combines, in a concentrated form, the most desirable, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time, it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organisation.

It beautifies the teeth and gums.

It arrests the decay of the teeth.

It acts as a detergent after smoking.

It renders the gums hard and healthy.

It neutralises the offensive secretions of the mouth.

It imparts to the breath a fragrance purely aromatic and pleasant.

Put up in large bottles (only one size) and in elegant toilet-cases, complete, at 2s. 6d. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.

Sole Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, 33, Farringdon-road, LONDON.

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare;
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald mists adorn;
Sweet as rosebuds bursting forth
From the richly-laden earth,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to the sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May,
Which cast their sweetest from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast round its mystic wand
And produced from fairy's bower
Scented perfumes from each flower
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beautify and grace—
Such is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalcules," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco-smoke.

For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The Floriline should be thoroughly brushed into all the crevices, no one need fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing over decayed teeth, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as a cherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on no account omit to use the "Floriline" regularly each morning if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Floriline" is sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact;
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use what good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by its constant use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce.
It is the talk of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whist general now becomes the use
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers,
The teeth a pearly white;
The gums it hardens, and it gives Sensations of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve,
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.For the TEETH and BREATH.

It may or may not be generally known that microscopic examination has proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may easily satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially decayed tooth, when the living animalcules will be found to resemble a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these parasites without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.

"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary, when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most delightful and effective toilet article for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in a long experience have ever used is the new Fragrant Floriline. It is quite a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable."

"Of all the numerous nostrums for cleansing the teeth which from time to time have been advertised, I find that nothing to be compared with the Floriline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."

From the "Young Ladies' Journal,"—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned Floriline. It cleanses the teeth and imparts a pleasant odour to the breath. It has been analysed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its usefulness. It is frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers, therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Floriline."

NATURE'S GREATEST REMEDYWITHIN THE REACH OF ALL.

ELECTRICITY, it is well known, repairs waste by energizing all vital functions, and thus promotes perfect health, strength, and happiness. It is therefore the most positive natural restorative extant for such cases as—

Indigestion, Loss of Voice, Constipation,
Liver Complaints, Asthma, Mental and Physical Weakness,
Neuralgia, Bronchitis, Paralysis, Epilepsy, Functional Disorders, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Writer's Cramp.

SELF APPLICATION of this potent remedy is successfully, safely, and cheaply facilitated by the recent improvements of PULVERMACH'S world-famed GALVANIC CHAIN-BANDS, officially approved by the Academy of Medicine, Paris, and other Medical and Scientific authorities in England and abroad. Arranged in accordance with the seat of the ailment to be treated, these CHAIN-BANDS, made of the finest gold and silver, are contrived as BRACELETS, SCARF-BANDS, FRONTS, NECKLETS, JOINT BELTS, POCKET BATTERIES, so as to ensure their utmost convenience and efficiency.

THOUSANDS of Private Testimonials, bearing dates in close succession, a few of the latest of which are below, vouch for their efficacy in cases where other remedies have failed. See Pamphlet, "GALVANISM: NATURE'S CHIEF RESTORER OF IMPAIRED VITAL ENERGY," post-free from

GALVANISM v. SCIATICA.

"South Darby, near Matlock, Feb. 27, 1882.

"Dear Sir,—I wish to state that I have been as able to do my work these last two months as ever I was in my life; thank God for it. I have found your Belt to be a wonderful cure. I had three weeks in Buxton Hospital, and came out nearly the same as I went in. I have gained 24 stone since wearing your Galvanic Belt, and I think it is the only cure for sciatica. You may use my letter and address.—I am, your obedient servant,"

"J. L. Pulvermacher, Esq."

GALVANISM v. NERVOUS DEBILITY.

"Cowes, Isle of Wight, Feb. 25, 1882.

"Dear Sir,—I am happy to inform you that, after wearing the Belt for two months, I am completely cured. If you should use this as a testimonial, kindly withhold my name, and oblige yours, very truly,"

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher."

Full name and address on application.

GALVANISM v. NEURALGIA and GENERAL DEBILITY.

"Wantage, Berks, Feb. 14, 1882.

"Dear Sir,—I am pleased to state that both my patients benefited from the authenticity of the cure. A case of Neuralgia, was quickly cured. The other, Lumbago with General Debility, found considerable relief. I shall be glad to recommend your Galvanic Bands when suitable cases present themselves. You may use my name and letter in any way you think proper.—Faithfully yours,"

"Thos. G. Emerson, M.D."

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher."

GALVANISM v. EXTREME DEBILITY.

"20, Sutton-st., Commercial-rd., Shadwell, E., Feb. 9, 1882.

"Dear Sir,—Last year I received from you a Galvanic Chain-Band, and, although I received great benefit, I was not cured. You then wrote, and advised me your Galvanic Battery; but, being only a poor widow, I had no money and therefore had to apply to the Surgical Aid Society, and with the aid of kind friends and the kindness of the Secretary, I obtained your Battery. At that time I had never been out of doors for ten years. I used to try to get out, but, after walking a few yards I felt so bad I was obliged to get in again; but after applying your Galvanic Battery for a few times—oh! what joy to be able to walk—I could hardly realise it; it seemed too good to be true. Then made rapid progress, and now I can get about as well as ever I could. I feel I can never be thankful enough for so great a blessing. You may use this letter as you like.—I am, yours respectfully,"

"J. L. Pulvermacher, Esq."

GALVANISM v. PAIN and WEAKNESS IN SIDE.

"Stamford Hill, Jan. 25, 1882.

"Sir,—I send you my name and address, and am willing to vouch for the authenticity of the subjoined extract from a private letter. It is dated from a town in Persia, Dec. 6, 1881. It seems to me a duty to yourself and the public on the part of those who have derived benefit from the use of the Chain-Bands, to make known that they have done so. In addition to the following testimonial, I may say that the Bands have been in use in our family at intervals for twenty-five years with marked success."

"E. G."

(EXTRACT.)

"... was a good deal troubled with pain in her weak side a few weeks ago, and I advised her to wear the Chain you sent me. It seems to have done her so much good, and has made her feel a much stronger altogether, that she would be very glad to have one long enough to go nearly round her. She says if it were ten times the price, it would be worth it for the benefit she derives from it."

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher."

Full name and address on application.

GALVANISM v. WEAK LUNGS and COUGH.

"Wakefield, Jan. 3, 1882.

"Dear Sir,—I wish to tell you how much good your Galvanic Bands have done me for my lungs. My husband got me one more than two months ago. I had been a great sufferer all last winter (1880), and again in October, 1881. Medicine was of no use to me, and I dreaded the winter; but now, after wearing your Galvanic Band, my cough is gone. I get good nights' rest, and the time I can make any use you like of my case, if you put only my initials. I am so thankful for the good I have got, and would like others to benefit the same.—I am, yours truly,"

"F. M. P."

"Mr. J. L. Pulvermacher."

Name and address on application.

GALVANISM v. INDIGESTION and SLUGGISH LIVER.

"Ardingley College, Hayward's Heath, Dec. 27, 1881.

"Gentlemen,—During last spring and the early part of the summer I suffered much from what my medical attendant ascribed to indigestion and a sluggish liver. At the beginning of August I procured one of your Galvanic Chain-Bands, and wore it during that month and September. As that is three months ago, and none of the symptoms have returned, I believe, and have every reason to hope, that my recovery is complete and permanent. You are quite at liberty to make what use you please of my letter. Common justice demands it.—Yours truly,"

"Messrs. Pulvermacher and Co."

GALVANISM v. SEVERE RHEUMATISM IN ARM.

"Stotfold, Beds, Dec. 10, 1881.

"Dear Sir,—I am very pleased to tell you the great relief me for my wife's arm has given her. At the time I wrote you my wife was seriously ill with rheumatic fever, and had been so for five weeks; the right arm was then quite helpless, the fingers could not be bent, nor the elbow, the pain being intense. After the first twenty-four hours' use of the Band there seemed to be a slight improvement, which continued every day, and after seven weeks' use the hand was disengaged, and the arm is sufficiently strong to enable my wife to do her household duties as before, which I thought she would never do again. You may make what use you like of this note, and I shall be pleased to answer any question.—I am, Sir, yours respectfully,"

"John W. Curtis."

TURKISH PASTILS.
"Through all my travels few things astonished me more than seeing the beauties of the harem smoking Karghies at Stamboul. After smoking, a sweet aromatic lounge or pastil is used by them, which is said to impart an odour of flowers to the breath. I have never seen these breath lozenges but once in Europe, and that was at PIESSE and LUBIN's shop in Bond-street."—Lady W. Montagu.

CHAPMAN'S ANGLO-INDIAN SPECIALITY.

AN Exquisite Dress Material, manufactured in England of the finest wools from the celebrated Vale of Cashmere, and by a special process of finishing rendered unshrinkable. Colours all ingrained, and in thirty New Art Shades. The effort on behalf of English Woollen Manufacture in which many ladies of position have taken a prominent part, should commend itself to every Englishwoman. With the object of promoting this national industry, I have had the above beautiful cloth expressly made for me, to meet the requirements of those desirous of promoting this laudable movement. In purchasing this unrivalled material, ladies will have the gratification of supporting both Home and Indian Industries. The Anglo-Indian Cashmere is in 8-yard lengths, 44 in. wide, which is ample to make a dress. Price per length, 22s. 6d. Any quantity cut at 2s. 9d. per yard.

WASHING DRESSES.
SATEENS.

The experience of the last two seasons has made me regard the above term as applied to printed sateens as "An absolute misnomer." The material itself, as now finished, is so perfect a representation of Satin as to readily mislead at a glance; while the perfect colourings of the various patterns are far too beautiful ever to be submitted to the tender mercies of the laundress. The best talent France produces is secured to furnish designs for these universally popular dresses, and the quaint patterns of some of these seasons' sateens illustrate how perfect the art of calico printing has become, and to what latitude talent will sometimes lend itself. One novelty, and I think an extremely pretty one, is "The Kate Greenaway." The designs are exact representations of the illustrations of this well-known authoress, therefore I think need no further description, or the designs can be furnished as a bordering only; and of the two I think the latter preferable, but both are very quaint and pretty. In cheaper goods there is quite an embarras de richesse. The variety is so great, the patterns chosen, with the laudable endeavour of pleasing every taste, are all excellent, and so numerous, that to attempt any special selection would lead me into occupying space that I must devote to other descriptions.

BRIGHTON.—THE NEW PULMANN LIMITED EXPRESS, Lighted by Electricity, and fitted with the Westinghouse Automatic Brake, now runs between Victoria and Brighton.

From VICTORIA, WEEKDAYS, at 10.0 a.m. and 3.50 p.m.
From BRIGHTON, WEEKDAYS, at 1.30 p.m. and 5.45 p.m.
This new Train, specially constructed and elegantly fitted up by the Pullman Car Company, consists of four Cars, each over 50 ft. in length.
The Car "Bedroom" (Drawing-room) contains also a Ladies' Boudoir and Dressing-room.
The Car "Lounge" (Parlour) contains also a separate compartment for a private party.
The Car "Victoria" contains a Buffet for Tea, Coffee, and other Light Refreshments, also a Newspaper Counter.
The Car "Maid" is appropriated for Smoking.
The whole Train is lighted by Electricity, the system being that of Edison's Incandescent Lamps in connection with Faure's system of Accumulators.
Lavatories are provided in each Car, and a separate compartment for servants is also provided in one of the Cars.
The staff attached to this Train consists of a Chief Conductor, Assistant Conductor, a Page Boy, and Two Guards.
There is a constant communication between the several Cars and the Conductors: a passenger travelling in any one of the Cars can therefore call the attention of the Conductor by pressing one of the small Electric discs.
There is a covered gangway communication between each Car, thereby enabling the Conductors to pass from Car to Car.

BRIGHTON.—EVERY SUNDAY.—A Cheap First-Class Train from Victoria at 10.45 a.m., calling at Clapham Junction and Croydon. Day Return Tickets, 10s.

A Pullman Drawing-room Car is run on the 10.45 a.m. Train from Victoria to Brighton, returning from Brighton by the 3.30 p.m. Train. Special Cheap Fare from Victoria, including Pullman Car, 10s., available by these Trains only.
Tickets and every information at the Brighton Company's West-End General Office, 28, Regent-circus, Piccadilly, and 8, Grand Hotel-buildings, Trafalgar-square; City Office, Hays' Agency, Cornhill; also at the Victoria and London Bridge Stations. (By order) J. P. KNIGHT, General Manager.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1882.

With the advent of the merry month of May the London season is in full vigour, if it is not in its prime. It is obvious that a decided stimulus has been given to fashionable life by the unusual brilliancy and spirit of the Royal wedding festivities last week, although they were brought to a premature close by the sad and unexpected death of the Duchess of Albany's sister. Civic hospitality has lost a golden opportunity of following in the wake of Royal ceremonials, but it hardly needed the splendour of a Mansion House banquet, postponed, if not abandoned, to deepen the cordiality of the popular greeting to the King of Holland—a country not for the first time brought into close relations with England. The antecedents of the House of Orange, and the gallant stand made by our Dutch allies at critical junctures on behalf of civil and religious freedom, are vividly recorded on the scroll of European history, and constitute a traditional and enduring tie between the two kindred nations. All too soon, constrained by family bereavement, his Majesty has been obliged to quit our shores, amid mutual regrets.

Not the least interesting sign of the quickened pulse of society at this period is the opening of the two opera-houses, and the great art-galleries. On the evening of Saturday last, when the fierce blast was dealing destruction on land and sea, and, we fear, blighting with its icy touch the promise of an abundant fruit crop, the élite of the artistic world, and distinguished representatives of most other sections of society, from Royalty downwards, were, in the customary genial fashion, celebrating the opening of the Royal Academy, surrounded by a year's trophies of the genius and industry of our foremost painters and sculptors. That banquet, like preceding dinners at Burlington House, illustrated the charming characteristics of English social life, when differences and rivalries—political, religious, and literary—are forgotten amid the claims of artistic skill and the refinements of cultivated taste. The President's retrospect of the past year's losses of the Academy—beginning with the late Dean Stanley, its honorary Professor of Ancient Literature, and ending with Sir Henry Cole, "to whom the world of art owes a deep and lasting debt"—was not less felicitous than the confidential pleasantries of Lord Granville and Mr. Russell Lowell relative to their first essays in landscape drawing; the happy allusions of the Prince of Wales to the military efficiency, as Volunteers, of the votaries "of the brush, the pencil, and the chisel;" and the delicate compliment paid by our accomplished Lord Chief Justice to the high standard of art maintained by Sir Frederick Leighton in the chef-d'œuvre that adorns the walls of the Academy and meets the admiring gaze of the thousands who flock thither.

Our American kinsmen (as well as ourselves) have to mourn over the loss of an accomplished and much-venerated citizen. The grave had not closed over the remains of our illustrious naturalist, Charles Robert Darwin, in Westminster Abbey, amid special marks of national respect and regret, before the tidings were flashed across the Atlantic of the death, in a green old age, of Ralph Waldo Emerson, the foremost and most revered of American philosophers, and, like his English contemporary, a student, though under different aspects, of man and his relation to the universe. The fearless exposition of his advanced views and transcendental theories, nearly half a century ago, provoked a storm of controversy, which re-echoed died out; and Emerson's brilliant essays have since been received with hardly less acceptance wherever the English tongue is spoken than the more rugged and vigorous inspirations of Carlyle. The citizens of the Great Republic are, indeed, the poorer for the loss, within so short an interval, of their most distinguished authors, Longfellow and Emerson, the highest exponents of poetical genius and profound thought on the Western Continent—names that will live in the memory of the Anglo-Saxon race as long as "Evangeline" charms the imagination and "Man the Reformer" perplexes the student of the mysteries of life.

The period between Easter and Whitsuntide has from time immemorial been in our political annals the equivalent of the Ides of March. Although there is no prospect of an acute Ministerial crisis, of the crumbling away of Mr. Gladstone's large majority, or of a sudden dissolution of Parliament, the drift of events awakens increased interest, if it is not tending to grave complications. The first sign of the "new departure" in Irish affairs was the recent debate on the Land Leaguers' bill for amending the Land Act, when the Prime Minister indicated in vague terms an intention to inaugurate a new policy, especially in making some external provision for the payment of the arrears of rent due from impoverished tenants. The not unexpected retirement of Lord Cowper from his viceregal position has followed. His Lordship is succeeded in the trying position of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by Earl Spencer, who has before discharged the duties of that office, and who, by mingled firmness and conciliation in less troublous times than the present, became a successful representative of the Imperial Government. As his Lordship is to retain not only his status as a member of the Cabinet, but to remain President of the Council, Lord Carlingford, Lord Privy Seal, undertakes for awhile the onerous duties of that important post. These informal announcements were only the prelude to the official statement of Tuesday evening, when both Houses of Parliament were crowded in expectation of important Ministerial declarations.

It is not merely a shifting of persons, but a change of programme that has been initiated. Coercion in the form sanctioned last year is to be abandoned, and Parliament will not be asked to renew the Peace Preservation Act. The three imprisoned members, Messrs. Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly, who are understood to have abandoned their "no-rent" manifesto, are already at large, and all political suspects are in due course to be released; but it is proposed to strengthen the law with a view to cope with agrarian murders and outrages in Ireland. Under these circumstances, the Chief Secretary, who declines to be responsible for the consequences of so great a change of policy, retires amid the regrets of colleagues and the sympathy of all who can appreciate the high-mindedness, devotion to duty, and self-sacrificing spirit of Mr. Forster. Though he cannot be even indirectly responsible for the Irish measures of the Cabinet, it seems possible that the provisional arrangements as to the office of President of the Council have been devised in the hope that he may by-and-by be induced to resume office as the head of the Education Department.

These are momentous changes, the consequences of which remain to be seen. The policy of conciliation and concession, leading to moderate Home Rule, in the Scotch sense, is to be further developed by the introduction of a measure for dealing with arrears of rent, and other proposals, such as the extension of the Bright clauses, for giving more vitality to the provisions of the Land Act. The expression of opinion in the House of Commons on Tuesday was, for the most part, constrained and guarded. While Mr. Sexton adopted a tone of remarkable moderation, and Irish Liberal members expressed themselves sanguine of a restoration of peace and order, Mr. Goschen, as an independent Liberal, was doubtful whether the release of social revolutionists will enable the Government to deal more effectually with a social revolution; Mr. Plunket, a foremost Irish Conservative, bitterly complained of the discouragement given to the supporters of law and order in Ireland; while more extreme Tories taunted the Cabinet with an ignominious surrender to the Land League. To these charges Lord Hartington responded by challenging a vote of censure on her Majesty's Ministers, which, of course, will not be moved.

In the absence of stirring Continental events, the reception of M. Pasteur as a member of the French Academy has excited more than local interest. In being admitted to a seat among the "immortal hundred," that distinguished physiologist, who has already taken a foremost place among the scientific discoverers of the age, was called upon to pronounce a eulogy on his predecessor, M. Littré, whose great dictionary was the consummation of a laborious literary career, and who warmly embraced the Comtist theory, which requires for certitude of belief an impossible scientific demonstration of the existence of a Supreme Being. With characteristic freedom, the newly-elected member condemned this shortsighted and illogical view of human experience. "The ideal of art, the ideal of science, the ideal of country, the ideal of the virtues of the Gospel—these," said M. Pasteur, "are the living sources of great ideas and noble deeds. They are illuminated by a gleam from the Infinite." It devolved upon M. Renan to reply to the youngest member of the Academy. This eminent and fascinating author, who has employed an accomplished pen and a brilliant imagination to turn the life of Christ into a picturesque romance, and to depict St. Paul as a grotesque enthusiast, demanded a theory of religion that would stand the test of historical criticism, and an order of facts in relation to Christianity that was independent of induction or analogy. The episode at the Academy last week was eminently French—that is, it was scenic, theatrical, and characteristic of a country where the excesses of sacerdotalism on the one hand, and the speculations of free thought on the other, have left the average mind to grope in a state of pitiable perplexity around the great problems that strain the human intellect and obscure religious faith.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Are you acquainted with Sir John Suckling's "Ballad on a Wedding"—the marriage of Lord Broghill, if I mistake not? Of course, you know your Suckling, and are "up" in the airy stanza descriptive of the bride:

Her cheeks, so rare a white was on,
No daisy makes comparison
(Who sees them is undone).
For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Cath'rine pear,
The side that's next the sun.

Her lips were red; and one was thin
Compar'd with that was next her chin
(Some bee had stung it newly).
But, Dick, her eyes so guard her face,
I durst no more upon them gaze
Than on a sun in July.

Surely there has rarely been sung a more melodious epithalamium. But you know it, I daresay, by heart. Handel's Occasional Overture and Mendelssohn's Wedding March? you hear those magnificent compositions well with the ears of your mind. And Wedding Cake? You are fond of that luscious and not always indigestible compound, I trust. You have seen the pictures of the Royal Wedding Cake as designed, modelled, and manufactured by Messrs. Bolland, of Chester, historic bride-cake makers for Royal Weddings. That is all. Go away, and marry or be given in marriage. I have had enough of Hymen, this week, to last me for a long time.

On the occasion of a Royal marriage or a Royal funeral in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, the representatives of that press with which nobody can do without, but which most people unite in vilifying and sneering at, are admitted to the organ-loft: from which point of espy they have an excellent view both of the ceremony at the altar and the Royal processions in the nave. I have seen a good many of these pageants during the last two score years, from the marriage of the Prince of Wales downwards; and the spectacle of Thursday, the twenty-seventh ultimo, was scarcely calculated to arouse exceptional enthusiasm. All, however, was done in a very handsome and comely manner; and the scene was a very glittering and dignified one. It would have been more splendid had the Knights of the Garter present wore their blue velvet robes, as they did on the occasion of the Prince of Wales's union with the Princess Alexandra.

Your appreciation of a grand Court Show is not enhanced by the consciousness that, when the pomps and vanities are over, you have to hurry up to London and make three columns and a half of printed matter out of that which could very fitly be narrated in fifty lines; and there is little inducement to feel unusually festive in the uncertainty as to whether you will be able to obtain any lunch, and the absolute certainty that you will not get any dinner until past midnight. The penny-a-liners are, no doubt, a reprehensible crew; still, the creatures must feed, and are as liable as more reputable persons to the pangs of hunger, and the throes of thirst.

Add to the Royal Wedding the private views of the Exhibitions of the Royal Academy and the Grosvenor Gallery, each followed by six hours' hard labour (not for this, but for another journal), and add to these "Odette" at the Haymarket, a couple of leading articles, a journey to Nottingham to be present at the distribution of prizes at the Local (ho!) of Art, and the putting together these present "Echoes," all in the course of eight days, and you will grant, I think, that the lot of "the compiler of gossip" is not altogether a happy one. Now I do not add to the galley slave's work of the week the opening of some seventy-five letters. There they lie. Their seals and gummed flaps are yet intact. Aha! But it is wicked to grumble. Think of the long hours, hard work, and scant pay of railway guards, signalmen, and ticket-collectors; of omnibus drivers, and barmaids at railway buffets; of linendrapers' assistants, male and female; of Manchester warehousemen's "entering" clerks; of costermongers and Italian organ grinders.

In proposing the health of the King of the Netherlands, the eloquent President of the Royal Academy observed at the banquet on Saturday last, that his Majesty was the son of the gallant Prince who "fought and gloriously bled under the flag of England, and in command of English troops, on the field of Quatre Bras." "Why, Certainly!" as Mr. Burnand's "Colonel" would say. But did not the father of the King of the Netherlands likewise fight and bleed as gloriously at the "King-making victory," Waterloo itself? Here is the record, from the Duke's own Waterloo despatch:—

His Royal Highness the Prince of Orange distinguished himself by his gallantry and conduct, till he received a wound from a musket-ball through the shoulder, which obliged him to quit the field.

Of course Miss Cornelia Knight, in her autobiography, has a great deal to say respecting the "Waterloo" Prince of Orange, who came to England in 1814, with the Allied Sovereigns, and was so very near marrying our Princess Charlotte. Miss Knight tells us that both the Prince Regent and the Tsar Alexander of Russia tried their hardest to induce the Princess to accept the hand of the young gentleman from the Hague; and Queen Charlotte had even undertaken to purchase her granddaughter's wedding clothes, "telling her that she need only have one Court dress, as hoop petticoats were not worn in Holland." But the Princess resolutely refused to leave England "without an Act of Parliament." In the very next page to that in which Miss Knight recites the rupture of the betrothal to the Prince of Orange one reads:—

It is said that I and the servants were to be dismissed, and that an apartment was being fitted up for the Princess Charlotte at Carlton House. Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, a handsome young man, a general in the Russian service, brother-in-law to the Grand Duke Constantine, and a great favourite of the Emperor of Russia, told Miss Mercer Elphinstone many of these particulars. . . . He paid many compliments to the Princess Charlotte, who was by no means partial to him, and only received him with civility. However, Miss Mercer evidently wished to recommend him; and when we drove in the park he would ride near the carriage and endeavour to be noticed. . . . In the mean time it was reported that he was frequently at Warwick House, and had even taken tea with us, which not one of the Princes had done, except Prince Radzivil, whom we invited to sing and accompany himself on the guitar.

Two years afterwards the Princess Charlotte was to become the bride of Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg. Shortly after their nuptials the illustrious pair went to Drury Lane Theatre to witness the then new tragedy of "Bertram," in which the principal character was sustained by Edmund Kean. After the tragedy "God Save the King" was sung, with three additional stanzas, in honour of the occasion. The last two stanzas I quote:—

Long may the Noble line
Whence she descended shine
In Charlotte the Bride.
Grant it perpetuate,
And ever make it great:
On Leopold blessings wait,
And Charlotte the bride.

L'homme propose et Dieu dispose. In November, 1817, the Princess Charlotte died; and her widowed husband was destined to become King of the Belgians, and to re-marry a daughter of Louis Philippe, King of the French.

I read in the World—

I see in the current number of the Illustrated News, that "G. A. S." relates the old story of Thackeray being too late for Punch with a certain copy of verses, and a little huffed with Mark Lemon, sending them in consequence to the Times. These verses, he says, were not those known as the "Crystal Palace," but the "May-Day Ode," which is another sort of thing altogether. But is this so? Anthony Trollope, in his little life of Thackeray ("English Men of Letters"), exactly reverses the contention of G. A. S. He tells the story with much detail of circumstance, quotes a few stanzas, and adds, "in the Times of next Monday it appeared—very much, I should think, to the delight of the readers of that august newspaper." A reference to the files of that "august newspaper" would settle the matter, of course; but my library is not yet of dimensions sufficient to contain so very bulky a work.

My dear "Atlas," this paragraph of yours is simply the outcome of the deplorable failing called indolence. I said last week in these "Echoes" that Mr. Thackeray's poem on the Great Exhibition of 1851, which appeared in Punch, was not the "May-Day Ode" on the same subject which appeared in the Times. Now I am convinced, my "Atlas," that, although your shelves may not be cluttered with piles of the Times newspaper, from the year '51 downwards, you do possess a set of the édition de luxe of the Works of William Makepeace Thackeray, in twenty-four volumes, London: Smith, Elder, and Co., 1879. If you will only take the trouble to turn to Vol. XXI., p. 42, you will find the "May-Day Ode," beginning—

But yesterday a naked sod,
The dandies sneered from Rotten Row,
And canter'd on it to and fro,
And see 'tis done!
As though 'twere by a wizard's rod,
A blazing arch of lucid glass
Leaps like a fountain from the grass
To meet the sun.

This is the "May-Day Ode" which first saw the light in the Times. Then, my "Atlas," turn to page 216 of the same volume, and you will find, in the "Lyra Hibernica" section of Mr. Thackeray's ballads, a set of verses entitled "The Crystal Palace," in one of which occurs the precise reference to Sir Henry (then Mr.) Cole which I mentioned last week. The verse in question is in page 218:—

I seen (thank Grace!)
This wondrous place
(His Noble Honour, Mister
H. Cole it was
That gave the pass
And let me see what is there).

This is the Exhibition poem which (as I pointed out) was printed in Punch. The two compositions are wholly distinct and dissimilar; and the London World is not the New York World; and fleas are not lobsters (as Sir Joseph Banks is said to have said), my "Atlas."

It is scarcely "Atlas," I should say, but rather one of his Smart Young Men, who, in suggesting the correction of some typographical errors in the catalogue of the Grosvenor Gallery, remarks:—

No. 17, "Che sara sara," by Mr. Britten, wants some accents to be right; if with a couple of accents over the final a's, it is the Bedford motto; if with a note of exclamation after the che, it might signify surprise at the Bernhardt-Damalas bridal.

It happens that the final a's in the "Bedford motto" take, not acute but grave accents:—"Che sarà sarà."

We have all been reading about the lamentable rent disturbances in the Isle of Skye, and of the committal of sundry Skye "crofters" for trial on a charge of "deforcement and assault, combined or alternatively." My pleasant and instructive contemporary, the Leisure Hour, observes that land agitation is, unhappily, no new thing in Skye, and reminds us that when Dr. Johnson visited the Hebrides "he was much dissatisfied at hearing heavy complaints of rents racked and people driven to emigration," and that he said that "if an oppressive chieftain were the subject of a French King he would probably be admonished by a lettre de cachet." The Johnsonian sentiment was altogether right and just; but practically, no French Seigneur who rack-rented his tenants would have been in the slightest danger of incurring the Royal displeasure. The French peasantry were, prior to the Revolution, "taillables et corvéables à merci," liable to grievous imposts and to forced labour at the absolute discretion of their lords; and what little skin was left upon them by the landowners was flayed off them by the Farmers General acting for the Crown. The most indulgent landlords were the superiors of the great monasteries.

"An Indignant Matron" has written to a morning contemporary, commenting, in terms of justifiable warmth, on a spectacle which she recently witnessed in front of the railway station in High-street, Kensington. She saw a group of women, with baskets full of flowers, not seated under the covered front of the station, and thus protected from the pouring rain; but standing in a row in the gutter: their feet in pools of water, their bonnets, shawls, and dresses exposed to the drenching rain. On inquiring from a woman from whom the Indignant Matron bought her flower, she was informed that the railway authorities had forbidden them to take shelter under the porch of the station, and that they were forced, from fear of the police, to stand in the road; "while the shelter which might so properly have been occupied by them was, on this occasion, taken up by a lot of low roughs, who, with pipes in their mouths, in lazy attitudes, and constantly using the lowest language, made the place unapproachable by a lady and a child."

The "Indignant Matron" may or may not be aware that for some time past there has been in existence a Flower-Girls' Mission and a Flower-Girls' Brigade, in which the Baroness Burdett-Coutts and other kind-hearted ladies take an active and beneficent interest. Every effort is made to foster habits of temperance and respectability among these hard-working women; and highly successful measures have been adopted to wean the younger girls from the always perilous life of the streets, and to provide for them homes where they are taught the pretty and after a time remunerative art of making artificial flowers. As regards the sellers of natural flowers, I can scarcely believe that either the railway companies or the police would wantonly prevent those whom I may call the Baroness Burdett-Coutts girls from plying their trade, so long as they behave themselves properly and do not unnecessarily obstruct the pavement.

It is necessary, at the same time, to point out that there is a considerable number of flower-girls and women who have nothing to do with the Mission or the Brigade—who are habitually disorderly, and often intemperate—who are importunate and insolent, and who, on occasion, launch out in language quite as vile as that indulged in by the street roughs "with short pipes in their mouths, and in lazy attitudes." What kind of flower-girls are to be found near the station of the Underground Railway in High-street, Kensington, I do not know; but I do know that in the neighbourhood where I take the liberty of residing—that of the St. Pancras and King's-cross termini—the bouquetières are simply a detestable nuisance. The best are the old women, who are usually Irish, and as civil as they are industrious—and, I am sorry to say, rheumatic. The majority of the younger ones are impudent hussies.

I learn that on Friday, the Twelfth of May, a grand Ball is to be given in the new ball-room at Bailey's Hotel, South Kensington, in aid of the funds of that excellent undertaking, the Ladies' Work Society, in Sloane-street, S.W. The South Kensington Ball will be under the immediate patronage of the Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince Leopold (Duke of Albany), Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), and a host of great ladies; while in the list of stewards I find the names, among others, of the Dukes of Norfolk and Portland, Lord Yarborough, Sir George Arthur, Colonel Stanley Clarke, and Mr. Charles Hall. It is to be a crème de la crème festivity, and tickets can only be obtained from the Lady Patronesses and from Miss Nattali at the offices of the Ladies' Work Society as aforesaid.

I have been particular in mentioning the crème de la crème for the reason that the esteemed firm who conduct the important establishment called Willis's Rooms have just courteously sent me, as a curiosity, some Lady and Gentlemen "vouchers" for Almack's Balls—the old original Almack's, be it fully understood, not the new. Fifty years ago how many fair damsels would have given—well, not their pretty ears perhaps, but certainly as much silver and gold as the most indulgent of papas could bestow on them, for one of these little quadrangular bits of cardboard with a little red seal in the corner! "Gentlemen's Voucher. Almack's. Deliver to"—here is a blank—"Three Tickets for the Balls on the Thursdays." "Ladies' Voucher. Assembly, King-street, St. James's. Almack's. The Sixth." Vieux Habits, vieux Galons!

How dangerous it is to be dogmatic in re "Mark" is shown in a courteous letter from "G. B.," who refers me to the Shakspeare of 1821, twenty-one volumes, frequently called "Boswell's Edition." In the "Othello," vol. ix., p. 233, Act i., sc. 1, occurs the following note on "Bless the Mark!" "Kelly," in his comments on Scots proverbs, observes that the Scots, when they compare person to person, use the expression "Save the Mark." My correspondent, however, finds the phrase in Churchyard's "Tragic Discourse of a Dolorous Gentlewoman," &c., A.D. 1593:—

Not beauty here I claim by this my talke,
For brown and blacke I was, God bless the Mark;
Who calls me fair doth scarce know cheese from challe.

And "G. B." adds, "It is singular that both Shakspeare and Churchyard should have used this term of words with reference to a black person." But Stevens says, "Our author uses it in 'Henry IV.,' Part I., without any such reference—

Of guns, and drums, and wounds, God save the mark."

"If this writing," concludes "G. B.," "is not so distinct as you might wish, be pleased to attribute it to the great age of the writer—eighty-eight years." We will wind up our "mark-et overt" this week, if you please, with an extract from Dr. Brewer. Copies have been sent by fifty correspondents.

In "Brewer's Dictionary of Phrase and Fable," Twelfth Edition, p. 790, is found the following:—

In archery, when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out "God save the mark!"—i.e., prevent anyone coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. Ironically it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere. God save the mark! ("I. Henry IV.," i. 3). Hotspur, apologising to the King for not sending the prisoners according to command, says the messenger was a "popinjay" who made him mad with his unmanly ways, and who talked like a waiting gentlewoman of guns, drums, and wounds (God save the mark!)—meaning that he himself had been in the brunt of battle, and it would be sad indeed if "his mark" was displaced by the Court butterfly. The whole scope of the speech is lost sight of by the ordinary interpretation—"May the scars of my wounds never be effaced" (God save my scars).

But what is Dr. Brewer's authority for claiming "Save the Mark" as a term of archery? G. A. S.

ARRIVAL OF PRINCESS HELEN IN ENGLAND: THE WELCOME AT QUEENBOROUGH.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCES AT WINDSOR.

THE ROYAL WEDDING: THE QUEEN'S PROCESSION TO ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

It happened that I was bidden to the Royal Academy banquet on Saturday evening last, and I was thus prevented from witnessing the first performance in London, at the Globe Theatre, of the adaptation by Mr. Thomas Hardy and Mr. Comyns Carr of the former gentleman's novel, "Far from the Madding Crowd." On Monday I had to go down to Nottingham, and I only returned in time to see the "Echoes" through the press; so that I must defer until next week a careful examination of the piece at the Globe. I only gather from a hasty glance at the newspapers that "Far from the Madding Crowd" achieved a gratifying amount of success, and that "the great situation at the end of the second act is identical in motive with the situation which occurs in 'The Squire,' when the heroine appeals to her rejected lover to spare the rival whom he believes to have injured her for the sake of her unborn infant." And I see it stated that "in most other respects the detailed stories of the two plays have so little in common that 'Far from the Madding Crowd' may well claim to be judged on its own merits, and apart altogether from any reference to the rival production with which controversialists may be tempted to compare it, and may be pronounced a stirring melodrama of what may be called 'rustic' interest rather than a 'pastoral' play." Nous verrons. The distinction between a "rustic melodrama" and a "pastoral play" is, at the first blush, rather a subtle one; but on reflection it becomes intelligible. By-the-way, if any of our budding playwrights need a plot for a really stirring "stagey" "rustic melodrama," why do they not have recourse to a certain rural romance written about forty years ago by Thomas Miller (the basket-weaving poet) and called "Gideon Giles, the Roper." It seems to me to possess every element of dramatic interest. Among the characters there were, I think, a virtuous roper, an artless maiden his daughter, a dissolute young squire, an unutterably wicked gamekeeper, and two very comic poachers, endowed with phenomenally voracious appetites, named respectively Ben Brust and Cousin William. The "situations" comprise a poaching affray, a distraint for rent, a scene in the exercising yard of a county jail, a rope-walk, and a house on fire. What more could the budding playwright desire as a "scenario"? An additional inducement is offered to the dramatist in the circumstance that Mr. Thomas Miller is dead; and no question of the novelist's rights could arise were "Gideon Giles, the Roper," adapted to the stage.

"Odette" has been, since the first performance, considerably and advantageously shortened, and plays altogether more crisply and effectively. I must see it again ere I can do full justice to the alterations which have been made; but the play and the performers have been so unmercifully bantered in this week's Punch that I should say that "Odette" has a very fair chance, indeed, of enjoying a long run. They say in France that "le ridicule tue," but laughed-at things and people last long in this country. Mr. Tupper was laughed at for very many years, "Yet still his name is of account, And still his voice hath charms." Mr. Oscar Wilde was laughed at; but he is coming back soon, I hear, flushed with Pacific victories and ready for fresh triumphs in English "too too society." One of the very best ways of making anything popular among us is to deride it unsparingly; and the career of M. Sardou's play, "Engelshied" by the mysterious adapter, may be actually lengthened by Mr. Burnand's clever parody, "O Dette; or, Very Much Borrowed." But surely an apter title might have been suggested—"A New Way to Play Odette."

"Merry Doctor Brighton" tells me that Mrs. Langtry, improving in each fresh part she sustains, has achieved success in the attractive rôle of Hester Grazebrook, the heroine of Tom Taylor's play, "An Unequal Match." Many who admired the growing talent of this fascinating lady at the Haymarket will join me in wishing her similar triumphs throughout her provincial tour. G. A. S.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

The annual meeting of this society was held on Monday—Thomas Boycott, M.D., F.R.S., manager, in the chair. The annual report of the committee of visitors for the year 1881, testifying to the continued prosperity and efficient management of the institution, was read and adopted. The real and funded property now amounts to above £85,400, entirely derived from the contributions and donations of the members. Fifty-two new members paid their admission fees in 1881. Sixty-two lectures and nineteen Friday evening discourses were given last year. The books and pamphlets presented in 1881 amounted to about 270 volumes; making, with 623 volumes (including periodicals bound) purchased by the managers, a total of 893 volumes added to the library in the year. Thanks were voted to the president, treasurer, and the honorary secretaries, Messrs. Warren De La Rue and William Bowman; to the committees of managers and visitors, and to the professors, for their valuable services to the institution during the past year. The following gentlemen were unanimously elected as officers for the ensuing year:—President, the Duke of Northumberland, D.C.L. LL.D.; treasurer, Mr. George Busk, F.R.S.; and secretary, Mr. William Bowman, LL.D. F.R.S.

A new railway, a section of the Swindon, Marlborough, and Andover line, from Grafton Station, in Wilts, to Andover Junction, in Hants, was opened on Monday; and the new branch of the North-Eastern Railway from Scarborough to Pickering, and thence to Whitby, was opened the same day.

Sir Edward Watkin, on behalf of the International Submarine Railway Company, has informed the Board of Trade that the work upon the Channel Tunnel will not be carried further seaward at present. Operations are, however, still going on at the approaches and within the limits of the private property owned by the company.

Mr. George Augustus Sala, rather unaccountably, bearing in mind his rare oratorical power and knowledge of Art, was not called upon by Sir Frederick Leighton to speak at the Royal Academy banquet. But Mr. Sala found his opportunity, and made good use of it on Tuesday evening. This distinguished journalist then delivered an instructive address in the Albert Hall at Nottingham, admirably calculated to incite the students at the Nottingham School of Art to persevere and succeed in the graceful study they have entered upon with a promise rewarded on the occasion by acceptable prizes. In one eloquent sentence Mr. Sala said:—"For himself he should like to see the whole kingdom covered with schools of design; he should like to see art not only in every gentleman's house, not only in public galleries, but also in the poor man's home—(hear, hear)—and, thanks to their illustrated newspapers, they had a great deal of art put in the poor man's home; and in the poor man's home now, in lieu of the vile colour and form in the pictures he could recollect forty years ago, they had forms of beauty and grace both in design and colour."

MUSIC.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Madame Albani's first appearance this season took place on Saturday evening, when, as Violetta in "La Traviata," the great artist sang with her accustomed success, especially in the brindisi, the duets with Alfredo and the elder Germont; and, above all, in the final dying scene. The levity of the opening scene was tempered by that natural grace and refinement which shine through all that this excellent artist does, while the passion and sentiment of the subsequent situations were very finely rendered. The cast included Signori Frapolli and Cotogni, in the important parts of the younger and the elder Germont.

The special announcement for this week was the début of Mlle. Stahl as Amneris in "Aida" on Thursday. Of this we must speak next week.

GERMAN OPERA IN LONDON.

At present we can merely record the promised opening of the performances of Wagner's Nibelungen Opera Dramas, announced for yesterday (Friday) evening, at Her Majesty's Theatre. We have more than once referred to the leading features of this scheme—as also to those of the representation of some of Wagner's dramatic works and other German operas at Drury Lane Theatre (under Herr Richter's conductorship), to begin on May 18.

"Das Rheingold" was the work to be given at Her Majesty's yesterday (Friday) evening, this being the introduction to the trilogy of "Die Walküre," "Siegfried," and "Götterdämmerung," which are to follow, respectively, on May 6, 8, and 9, three repetitions of the Cylus being promised during the remainder of the month.

Herr Angelo Neumann has issued the following translation of a letter received from Madame Wagner:—"My husband asks me to tell you that he has considered for a long time before he sends to you the message, from sheer necessity, that he cannot come to London. He will be content if his strength be sufficient for his task in Bayreuth. In feeling convinced that he has given to you, dear Mr. Neumann, sufficient proof of his recognition of your admirable representations of his works, in order that you may not doubt that only necessity forces him to refuse your desire, he sends you through my medium his sincerest regards, to which I join the assurance of my high esteem.—COSSIMA WAGNER. Venice, April, 1882."

Madame Marie Roze has been engaged as the prima donna assoluta of the Carl Rosa Opera Company, and will make her début with this company immediately after the termination of her engagement at the Birmingham Musical Festival.

The Sacred Harmonic Society gave the last concert of the fiftieth season, and the final performance of the institution, yesterday (Friday) week, the occasion having derived special interest on this account, and from the active co-operation of Sir Michael Costa, who resumed the duties of conductor for the first time after his serious illness. The oratorio was Handel's "Solomon," the choruses of which were generally well sung, and the solos were efficiently rendered by Misses A. Williams and A. Vernon, Madame Patey, Mr. Guy, and Mr. Burgon. Mr. Willing was the organist, as usual. It is sad to think that this excellent society should die out, but it is to be hoped that the recent meeting of members may lead to its reorganisation.

The Bach Choir concert of last week included an impressive performance of the fine "Missa Brevis" of Bach, in A major, in which there is much grand writing, although the work is of comparatively small dimensions. The "Credo" from Palestrina's "Missa Papæ Marcelli," Mendelssohn's 98th psalm, the overture and third act of Gluck's "Armida," and Max Bruch's setting of a scene from "Odysseus" ("the banquet of the Phæacians"), made up a varied programme. The principal solo singers were Misses C. Elliott and Robertson, Madame Fasset, Mr. Kenningham, Mr. Kempton, and Mr. King. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt conducted. The fine singing of Miss Elliott in the music of Armida was a special feature of the evening.

Mr. Oscar Beringer's recital at St. James's Hall, last week, displayed his exceptional skill as a pianist in a selection of pieces by composers of the past and the present. Among other specialties were his fine rendering of Brahms's sonata in F minor, op. 5, and that of Liszt's "Concerto Pathétique" for two pianofortes, in association with that accomplished young pianiste, Miss Randegger. Vocal pieces were interspersed, and effectively sung by Mlle. Friedlander.

The opening of a new season at the Alexandra Palace, last Saturday afternoon, included Madame Christine Nilsson's fine singing in the soprano solos of Mr. W. Carter's cantata, "Placida," and of the "Inflammatus" in Rossini's "Stabat Mater." Both these works were well rendered, the other soloists in the first having been Madame Sterling, Mr. Lloyd, and Signor Poli; these, with the addition of Miss P. Winter (a promising young débutante) having all sung in the "Stabat." There was a good orchestra and chorus, Mr. W. Carter conducted, and the concert, together with miscellaneous entertainments before and afterwards, formed a very successful inauguration of Messrs. Jones and Barber's new season.

The series of "Symphony Concerts" directed by Mr. Charles Hallé opened well on Monday evening, when Beethoven's choral symphony was given with fine effect, especially in the orchestral portions. The difficult vocal solos were efficiently rendered by Miss A. Williams, Miss Orridge, Mr. V. Rigby, and Mr. Santley; and the choral parts were fairly well sung, considering their exceptional difficulty. Madame Sophie Menter played Rubinstein's third Pianoforte Concerto (in G) with brilliant execution; the remaining instrumental pieces having been Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" and Brahms's variations for orchestra on a theme by Haydn. The programme was completed by the fine song, "Der Kriegerstolz," from Spohr's "Jessonda," effectively sung by Mr. Santley.

The South London Choral Association gave their eighth public concert at St. James's Hall on Tuesday evening, with a well-varied programme of choral and solo music.

The Richter concerts opened their fifth season, at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday evening, the date having been altered from May 5 in consequence of the performance of Wagner's Nibelungen opera-dramas beginning on that evening. The programme of the concert now referred to included Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto, and other specialties. Of the performances we must speak next week.

Herr Franke's excellent chamber concerts began a new series of six at the Marlborough Rooms on Tuesday afternoon; and Herren C. Weber and A. Kummer finished their course of four at the Royal Academy of Music on Wednesday evening. Among the concerts of the week were those of Mlle. Roselli (at Steinway Hall), Mr. George Gear (St. George's Hall), and M. Gustav Pradeau (at the Kensington Townhall).

Mr. Prout's new cantata, "Alfred"—a setting of text written by Mr. W. Grist—was produced with success at the concert of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association on Monday evening, when the performance was conducted by the composer. There was a complete orchestra and sufficient chorus; the solo vocalists having been Miss A. Marriott, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. King. We shall doubtless hereafter have an opportunity of speaking further of the work.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, May 2.

Opening of the Summer Circus, opening of the Salon, opening of the Salon des Arts Décoratifs, opening of an exhibition at the Ecole des Beaux Arts of one hundred and fifty pictures of Gustave Courbet, opening of the Concert des Champs-Élysées, of the Cafés chantants, meeting of Parliament, first performance of Louise Michel's melodrama "Nadine," charity balls here, fêtes there, with what is the humble chronicler to begin his summary of the Parisian week? Happily, the criticism of the Salon has been entrusted to another pen, so that I have only to refer to the social aspect of the event. Varnishing day, as usual, was a pretext for a brilliant display of toilets and celebrities; and actresses, mondaines, gommeux, and literary people vied with each other in criticising the fragments of pictures that they saw between the moving maze of hats and feathers. Pierre de Chavannes's cartoon was pronounced to be grand; everybody asked why Bonnat had painted the portrait of the artist in a cellar illuminated with the electric light; nobody understood Manet's picture of the Folies Bergère; Carolus Duran's entombment was pronounced to be a clever pastiche; and Whistler's "Arrangement in black" had a majority of admirers. Then everybody went to breakfast at Ledoyen's, and so to the races at Longchamps, which were as brilliant as could be desired.

Parliament meets to-day after the Easter vacation. It appears that M. Gambetta intends to make the life of the present Cabinet miserable by systematic attacks both in the House and in the press. The members of the old Gambetta Cabinet—so short-lived—have turned journalists and founded a new morning journal, La Réforme, which is to support Gambetta. A grand newspaper campaign is being organised, and the ex-idol of Belleville is going to make a desperate effort to recover his former popularity.

The eminent chemist M. Pasteur was received at the French Academy on Thursday last. M. Pasteur, in a speech of no literary merit, took occasion of the panegyric of his predecessor, Littré, to attack the Comtist philosophy and to make a profession of spiritualist faith. M. Renan replied by a most ingenious and delicate profession of scepticism, and treated M. Pasteur very hardly indeed in the most exquisite and courteous language. As might have been expected, M. Pasteur was applauded for his principles and M. Renan for his wit.

Two important and scandalous affairs are now occupying the Parisian tribunal—one that of the Duchess de Chaulnes against her mother-in-law, the Duchess de Chevreuse, in which the Duchess de Chaulnes demands the restitution of her children, of whom she was deprived by a family council; the other the affair of the famous Union Générale. The hearing of both these cases will probably last some time. I mention them only for the sake of record. The examination of the proceedings of the Union Générale revealed some formidable details, as, for instance, this: the capital of the concern represented at the beginning 168 millions; the Union Générale speculated so immensely in its own stock that at a given date it had bought, at any price, 212 millions worth of its own scrip with the intention of selling it again at a rise! That such transactions should end badly was inevitable.

Calmann Lévy has published the first volume of the "Correspondence" of George Sand. The present instalment comprises letters from 1812 to 1836, when George Sand had already begun her literary career. The first half of the volume is dull, but the second half is very interesting.

Some curiosity may naturally be felt as to what kind of a play Louise Michel, the celebrated Communist, could write. "Nadine," the much-talked-of production of this eccentric fanatic, was produced on Saturday at the distant theatre of the Bouffes du Nord, in the presence of an audience composed of all the celebrities of journalism, clubs, and the demi-monde. The piece proved to be an ordinary melodrama, neither better nor worse than any other melodrama. A more noisy audience could not be imagined. From the beginning to the end the piece was received with laughter, cries of animals, orange-peel, and interruptions of all kinds; a phenomenon which has enabled the manager of the theatre to proclaim the piece of the eloquent citoyenne Louise Michel, le plus grand succès du XIX siècle. Flattering for Hugo, Dumas, Sardou, and the others! T. C.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE TREATY.

The treaty contracted between her Majesty the Queen and the reigning Prince of Waldeck and Pyrmont for the marriage of the Duke and Duchess of Albany was issued yesterday as a Parliamentary paper. It was signed on April 20, in London. Some of the particulars are already known through the Act of Parliament. In Article 2 her Majesty engages that Prince Leopold shall secure to the Duchess the annual sum of £1500, to be paid half yearly to her Serene Highness for her sole and separate use. By Article 3 the Duchess of Albany is assured of receiving £6000 a year in the event of her becoming a widow; while in Article 4 the reigning Prince of Pyrmont engages to deliver, within four weeks of the marriage, a dowry of 100,000 marks, or £5000, to be held in trusts, to be expressed in a separate instrument. His Serene Highness further engages to provide the Princess with "princely apparel, jewels, and an outfit suitable to a Princess of Waldeck and Pyrmont." By Article 5 Princess Helen renounces, in consideration of an existing contract with Prussia in favour of the said State, all possibly arising right of hereditary succession to the Principality of Pyrmont after her marriage by a special document, which will be confirmed by the signature of the Duke of Albany.

A Dundee correspondent of the Globe states that Sir Allan Young has chartered the steamer Hope, of Peterhead, for the expedition to be sent in search of Mr. Leigh-Smith's exploring party, whose vessel, the Eira, is supposed to be beset amongst the ice about Franz Josephland or Nova Zembla. The Hope is of 300 tons register, with engines of 70-horse power. She will proceed at once to London to be equipped, and the expedition it is expected will be commanded by Captain Markham.

An international competitive exhibition of ships' models was opened on Tuesday afternoon, at Fishmongers' Hall, by the Duke of Edinburgh, who was presented with an address and the freedom of the company. At a luncheon subsequent to the opening ceremony, his Royal Highness described the exhibition as one of the most interesting collections of models ever brought together, and paid a warm tribute to the exertions of the Shipwrights' Company in bringing it together.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

When the excitement consequent on the decision of the Two Thousand was over, matters became very dull again at Newmarket last week, for the Thursday's card was a very poor one, and only attracted a small company to the heath, though there was a great improvement in the weather. In spite of the moderate nature of her previous performances, Belle Henriette started a great favourite for the First Spring Two-Year-Old Stakes, and won so easily that the eleven who finished behind her must be moderate indeed. Exile II. (7 st. 9 lb.), who carried 4 lb. overweight to enable Wood to ride him, had little difficulty in winning the April Handicap, and as Golden Eye (8 st. 12 lb.) was never "in it," he must be pretty speedy. A field of a dozen contested the newly-instituted Stud Produce Stakes. Lady Brooks, who disappointed her backers at Thirsk the other day, being once more made favourite. She was out of it a long way from home, and eventually Songless, a smart-looking little daughter of Balfe and Teardrop, won, after a hard struggle with Highland Chief, who is a son of Hampton. On Friday, the Gardenia filly had only one to beat for a two-year-old race over the Rous Course; and, after two more races of only passing interest had been decided, the numbers of the runners for the One Thousand Guineas were hoisted. The field for this race promised, at one time, to be of unusual strength; but accident and illness have sadly thinned the ranks of our crack fillies, and only six starters could be got together. In 1875—Spinaway's year—there were the same number of runners; but, with that exception, we must go back to 1859 to find so small a field. Of course it did not look as though Shotover could be beaten, and, at last, as much as 4 to 1 was laid on her. St. Marguerite and Nellie had a few friends at 10 to 1; but nothing except these three daughters of Hermit was backed for a shilling. Shotover did not go by any means so freely and well as she had done on the Wednesday; and, some distance from home, it was noticed that Cannon was by no means comfortable on her. She was running head and head with St. Marguerite near the rails on the Stand side of the course, whilst Nellie, wide of the pair, was in the centre. The finish was desperately close and severe, and Fordham quite thought that he had won on Nellie; but when the numbers were hoisted it was found that St. Marguerite had beaten the favourite by a neck, whilst Nellie was a head behind Shotover. Granted that Shotover beat a very bad lot in the Two Thousand, and was none the better for her gallop through the heavy ground, still St. Marguerite's running behind Paragon and Zeus in the Craven week was so miserably bad, that the complete reversal of the form is perfectly astounding. This is the first good race Mr. Crawford has won this year, and we need hardly state that St. Marguerite is own sister to Thebais, who secured this same event last season. Of course there was another change in the Derby betting, Shotover being relegated to a comparatively long price; and, as Barbe Bleue is said to be a certain runner in the French Derby, the Epsom event looks like being a match between Bruce and Kingdom. Proceedings wound up with a T.Y.C. match between Alfonso and Pebble, in which the odds laid on the former were cleverly upset.

Every effort—and a great many have been made—to restore the ancient Chester Meeting to its former importance has signally failed; and, though there was a fair number of spectators on the Roodee on Tuesday, many prominent south-country followers of racing preferred to patronise the Windsor gathering. Brotherhood easily upset the odds laid on the English Tower and Sword for the Grosvenor Trial Stakes; and then Camilla, a speedy daughter of Macaroni and Feronia, just managed to secure the Mostyn Stakes, though she was lying away to nothing at the finish. Archer won the last four races on the card, two of them for the Duke of Westminster; and though Petticoat was not so good a favourite as Maria in the Stamford Plate, she had little trouble in conceding a stone, and never ought to have succumbed to Pebble at the Craven Meeting. On Wednesday, Camilla had an easy victory in the Badminton Plate, and as she also conceded 14 lb. to Maria, the Duke of Westminster's filly must be very moderate. This year has been remarkable for the very small fields that have contested important races, and it is nearly fifty years ago since the starters for the Chester Cup numbered so few as seven. Retreat (8 st. 11 lb.) and Brown Bess (7 st. 8 lb.) were the only ones backed with much spirit; but Prudhomme (8 st. 4 lb.), who was second last year, proved the winner, after a good race with Pilgrim (7 st. 11 lb.), the pair having the finish to themselves.

On Monday Edward Hanlan, of Toronto, and Edward Trickett, of Sydney, sculled from Putney to Mortlake for £1000 and the championship of the world. There was, perhaps, the best attendance of spectators that we have ever seen at any professional match on the Thames; but they must have been tempted there mainly by the beautiful weather, and not by the expectation of seeing anything of a race, for we doubt if a dozen people altogether believed that—bar accident—Trickett had the remotest chance of success. Odds of 5 and 6 to 1 against him found very few takers prior to the start, and before the men had gone a couple of hundred yards, 20 to 1 could have been had for the asking. There never was, indeed, a semblance of a race, and it would be quite useless to attempt any detailed account of the procession over the course. Hanlan paddled along four or five lengths in front, stopping now and again to acknowledge the applause he received from the crowds assembled at various favourite points, to bale his boat out, &c., and eventually won by a quarter of a mile. As soon as he had passed the winning-post, he whipped round and sculled back to meet Trickett, to whom he gave a short start in the last hundred yards, and then beat him by a length or so. The champion has to meet Wallace Ross in Canada towards the end of next month, and if he defeats him, as he seems certain to do, he can scarcely hope to find any one else bold enough to encounter him.

Heavy rain and a perfect hurricane of wind quite spoilt the Second Spring Meeting of the London Athletic Club on Saturday, as it was impossible for any one to accomplish fast times under such adverse conditions. The grand tricycle meet at Barnes was also a failure from similar reasons, but another will be held at an early date. On Monday, W. G. George won the Ten Miles Challenge Cup at the Moseley Harriers sports by rather over half a mile. He covered the distance in the magnificent time of 52 min. 56½ sec., which beats the previous best on record by no less than 1 min. 37½ sec.

The Australian cricketers, who are going to play a series of matches in England during the present season, arrived on Wednesday.

A Parliamentary return shows the costs of the eight election commissions, from which it would appear that Macclesfield was the most expensive, with a total of £5064. Gloucester comes next with £4161; Oxford following, with £3781; Chester, with £3352; Boston, with £2760; Knaresborough, with £2258; Sandwich, with £2139; and Canterbury, bringing up the rear, with £1727.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Party antagonism has led to the initiation of another great change in Ireland. Mr. W. H. Smith's notice of motion in favour of encouraging peasant proprietorships, and the preliminary report of the Lords' Committee on the Land Act recommending the State to take up the benevolent position of a huge Building Society to enable Irish tenants to purchase their holdings, have in all probability had the effect of forcing the hands of the Government. Be that as it may, the grave and weighty announcements the Ministry had to make to Parliament on Tuesday brought about gatherings in both Houses equalling in interest the similar scenes witnessed when the late Government had to acknowledge the resignation of the Earl of Derby and the Earl of Carnarvon.

It was noticeable on Tuesday that the right hon. gentlemen who lead the Opposition, and a goodly number of Irish members, made a strategic movement from the Lower to the Upper House, the former privileged Privy Councillors clustering with a certain picturesque suggestiveness round the Throne, and the latter crowding the galleries, the aim of all being to hear the earliest Ministerial statement with regard to the official changes determined on in Ireland. Earl Granville, fresh from Windsor, rose with habitual urbanity to reply to the Marquis of Salisbury's questions. Approaching the table with an ease suggestive of the neat preparatory movements of an adroit boxer, the noble Earl first banteringly remonstrated with the late Foreign Secretary for springing upon him so many questions the previous day. Lord Granville displayed accustomed tact in making his revelations. There was perfect courtesy in the tribute paid to Earl Cowper, who had actually resigned some weeks ago, but left it to Mr. Gladstone to settle the most convenient date on which he should surrender the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. "Painful" was it to the noble Earl to have to add that Mr. Forster had resigned the post of Chief Secretary for Ireland. Her Majesty had been advised to appoint as Lord Cowper's successor Earl Spencer, who would retain his seat in the Cabinet and the office of Lord President of the Council, the duties of which, however, would be performed by Lord Carlisle, the Lord Privy Seal. Earl Granville added that the Government did not at present intend to renew the "Protection of Life and Property Act"—better known as the Coercion Act—but had under consideration a measure to strengthen in Ireland the hands of Justice, and guard property and person more efficaciously. The three members imprisoned—Messrs. Parnell, O'Kelly, and Dillon—would be released from Kilmaham; and the cases of the other "suspects" would be carefully weighed. As for the needed revision of the Land Act, the Government hoped soon to be in a position to define their proposals with regard to arrears of rent, and an amendment of the Bright clauses. Ere these important items could be digested, the members of the Lower House made haste back to their own Chamber to listen to the same tale as told by the Prime Minister.

Earlier in the afternoon, shortly after the House of Commons met at two o'clock, in accordance with the new rule for Tuesdays, it fortuitously happened that one of the closing acts of Mr. Forster as Minister for Ireland was to make it absolutely clear, in answer to a question from Mr. Sexton, that Lord Cowper had formally reproved Inspector Smith for the indefensible clause in his circular to the constabulary force told off for the protection of Mr. Clifford Lloyd—the mischievous clause exonerating the constabulary from blame if they should happen to shoot an innocent man. Thereafter, the right hon. member for Bradford voted with the Government in the division against Mr. Lewis's motion for a new writ for Wigan, which was negatived on account of Wigan's peccadilloes on the score of bribery by 220 to 142 votes. But Mr. Forster was not in his place when, in an overcrowded House, and with the Duke of Cambridge and the Marquis of Salisbury conspicuous among the peers who looked down upon the thronged benches, Mr. Gladstone, in a marked tone of regret, fulfilled an unpalatable duty in an unexceptionable manner. The Prime Minister confirmed the explicit statement of the Foreign Secretary in "another place" that Earl Cowper had not resigned because of any difference of opinion with regard to Ministerial policy on Irish affairs. In similar terms did Mr. Gladstone refer to Earl Spencer as the new Viceroy; and to the release of the incarcerated Irish members. The consequent secession from the Ministry of Mr. Forster was alluded to in a sentence of high praise to the late Secretary for Ireland, who had discharged his onerous duties, the Premier said emphatically, "with such unwearied diligence, with such marked ability, and with such unfailing patriotism." Mr. Gladstone's explanation was received with some astonishment by the Opposition, and was subjected to more or less lively criticism by Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Chaplain, and Mr. Plunket, neat couplets being delivered by the latter two at the heads of the Ministry, who later received an acrid fire in the rear from Mr. Goschen, who, still shut out from the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, presumably found the rôle of "candid friend" congenial to him. But when Mr. Gibson, with more loudness than reason, attacked the Government, the Marquis of Hartington in a few vigorous and straightforward sentences warded off the blows with his usual good sense and cool judgment. It may be observed that Mr. Sexton, whose loyalty to his cause and resource as a debater have won for him general respect, was the chief mouthpiece of the Home Rulers in thanking Mr. Gladstone for the promise of substantial reforms in the Irish Land Act.

These changes in the Irish Executive are so engrossing that other questions appear insignificant by their side. The Session is three months old. Yet not a single bill of importance mentioned in the Queen's Speech has been introduced. Nor has a single proposal of the Government with regard to the reform of Procedure been agreed to. On Monday, after another evening devoted to the discussion, which brought up Mr. Bright with an acceptably clear speech on the Closure, which has become a sad necessity in the Lower House, a large majority—220 against 164—negatived Mr. O'Donnell's amendment, the purport of which was to make it obligatory on a Minister to prompt the Speaker before he could ask the House whether it was its pleasure to close a debate.

Mr. Forster was on Wednesday observed in close conversation with Mr. Bright on the Treasury bench; and the pending changes manifestly still occupied the attention of the House, albeit a Scottish Board Schools Bill for the protection of teachers from sudden dismissal was under consideration. On the promise of Mr. Mundella to facilitate the passing of a more effective bill this Session, Sir H. Maxwell withdrew his measure; and the rest of the afternoon was taken up with Mr. Stanhope's Church Patronage Bill, which was talked out.

The total amount realised by the ten-days' sale of the second portion of the Sunderland Library was £9376; the amount of the first ten-days' sale having been £19,377.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

FIRST NOTICE.

Macmillan for this month has several interesting contributions, but the only very striking one is the further instalment of Mr. Julian Hawthorne's "Fortune's Fool." Utterly impossible as a story, and by no means free from affectation in its mysticism, this curious tale undoubtedly displays something of a seer's insight into the more mysterious workings of human nature, and such a power of exciting and controlling attention as has never been manifested in the author's previous writings. "A Little Pilgrim," a parable of the other life, is full of tenderness and spiritual beauty. Professor Jenkin supplements Professor Bell's not very interesting notes on Mrs. Siddons by some excellent remarks on the principles of acting, and the brightening prospects of the stage; and Lady Barker contributes a picturesque account of a visit to the lonely but peopled African islet of Rodrigues. Mr. Tylor controverts some of Mr. Herbert Spencer's views on hereditary customs, with the addition of many curious observations; and an anonymous writer contributes a very weighty warning of the danger which this country always runs of a sudden surprise from foreign nations, supposing that negligence on our part rendered such an undertaking practicable.

Blackwood has two especially remarkable papers. One is an analysis of a recent American novel entitled "Democracy," painting the corruption of public life at Washington in very lively colours, which, however, a moderate acquaintance with American politics shows to be caricatured in some respects at any rate. The other is a discussion, in whose vehemence and animation we seem to recognise the voice of a very eloquent æsthetic writer, of Mozart's claims to be regarded as the special representative of the German nationality in music. Oulibicheff's view that Mozart was a romanticist in music is controverted, and he is pronounced "the culminating product of that great musical life of the eighteenth century which was absolutely and essentially Italian." "Across the Yellow Sea" is a very delightful bit of travel, and "The State of Art in England" contains some sensible remarks. The number concludes with an obituary notice of the late Colonel Lockhart, author of "Fair to See," a great loss to the magazine and to the public.

Two generals of high reputation—Sir Lintorn Simmons and Sir E. Hamley—add, in the Nineteenth Century, their testimony to the authority of those who have protested against the Channel Tunnel for military reasons. Their dissuasion will hardly be balanced in public opinion by the counter-protest of M. Reinach, who is as scandalised that France should be thought capable of a treacherous surprise as though Tunis had never been occupied and no French Government had ever perpetrated a coup d'état. It would have been better if Mr. Arnold's essay on American culture, or the absence of it, had been deferred until he had visited the States. It would then have acquired the geniality especially requisite for the inoffensive communication of unpleasant truth. In substance Mr. Arnold is, no doubt, right; his manner might be amended, and is sometimes calculated to defeat his own very laudable object of enforcing an improved secondary education upon the United States. If Oxford professors are supercilious, Americans are susceptible. Lord Brabourne gives vigorous expression to the doubts and apprehensions of moderate Liberals, as Mr. Guinness Rogers does to the confidence of the more advanced section, who can detect no symptom of a waning of Mr. Gladstone's popularity in the country. The gem of the number is Dr. Jessopp's "Arcady of our Grandfathers," a most picturesque—in some respects pleasing, in others painful—delineation of the life of agricultural England in the early years of this century, derived in many particulars from the lips of aged relics of the past.

The most attractive contribution to The Century is Carlyle's Irish diary of 1849, not so much on account of Ireland as of Carlyle. It displays his incisiveness, graphic power, occasional discourtesy, impatience of bores and humbugs, and generally prompt recognition of worth and service. Mr. Lowell is the subject of a fine engraved portrait and a fair critical essay. A Jewess answers the Russian lady's extenuation of the Jewish persecution in Russia; and Mrs. Mitchell contributes another delightful and beautifully illustrated paper on Greek sculpture, treating of its post-Alexandrian or naturalistic period. "The Atlantic Monthly is especially interesting for "Mad River," Longfellow's last poem, which, if in some degree an echo of the song in Tennyson's "Brook," is still most delightful for buoyancy of style and felicity of expression, and wonderfully vigorous for such a veteran. Mr. Thomas Hardy begins a new novel, "Two on a Tower," which promises well. There are also excellent papers on "The Arrival of Man in Europe," "The Evolution of Magic," and the recent financial panic in France. Harper has beautifully illustrated papers on "Spanish Vistas" and "Northern Michigan," with others abundantly strewn with portraits of Austrian musicians and London poets—the latter including portraits of Messrs. Gosse, Lang, Marston, and others whose features have not previously been made familiar to the public.

Temple Bar contains one very brilliant paper—"George Sand in Berry," where extracts from the great writer's own "Promenades" and eloquent sentiment of the English author's own composition combine to produce a singularly attractive essay. "Madame Malibran's Marriage" tells how the great singer was victimised by her unworthy father; and there is much amusing matter in the reminiscences of Lord Stratford de Redcliffe. London Society has several entertaining contributions, especially "Lady Students at Cambridge," and "The Lost Arts of Conversation and Letter-Writing."

At Tuesday's meeting of the Council of the Central Chamber of Agriculture it was resolved, upon the motion of Earl Fortescue, to request the Ministry to bring in a bill during this Session on local government and taxation, in order that the country might have an opportunity of considering its provisions during the recess.

At the recent Naval and Submarine Exhibition in the Agricultural Hall, Mr. Richard Roper, of New-croft, S.E., gained the first prize of one hundred guineas for his self-launching bridge life-raft, "as affording the readiest means, in case of shipwreck, of saving collectively a large number of persons and supporting them above water for a lengthened period;" and Messrs. J. and A. W. Birt the fifty-guinea prize "for their contrivances of cork mattresses, hammocks, cushions, seats, &c., for supporting individually persons in the water till further assistance can be rendered."

The Registrar-General reports that 2490 births and 1520 deaths were registered in London last week. The deaths included 16 from smallpox, 57 from measles, 32 from scarlet fever, 14 from diphtheria, 129 from whooping-cough, 15 from enteric fever, 14 from diarrhoea and dysentery, and not one either from typhus, simple continued fever, or simple cholera. A carman died in the Hackney Workhouse Infirmary on April 22 from "senile decay," whose age was stated to be one hundred years. In Greater London 3121 births and 1828 deaths were registered.

NEW HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH STAGE.

The strong interest now taken in the stage and all dramatic matters could not be better illustrated than in the steady increase of theatrical books and histories. For a very long time in the immediate memory of most modern playgoers they were a perfect drug in the market. Relatively speaking, America took more interest in dramatic literature than England, and all scarce editions, illustrated books and rare prints found their way to the other side of the Atlantic. Such valuable collections as those made by the late Mr. Lacy, of the Strand, which never ought to have been scattered, were bought up by our American cousins, and of all known arts that of the drama has been more written about in newspapers but less preserved than any other. There was a time when the published criticisms of Hazlitt and Charles Lamb commanded a ready sale, and it has been assumed in consequence that the art of dramatic criticism has been lost since that date. Leigh Hunt's collected criticisms from the Examiner is so rare a book that few theatrical libraries possess it; Professor Morley's Journal of a Playgoer is out of print, and is comparatively valueless on account of the absence of an index; that fine compendium of modern criticism known as "Actors and Acting" does not contain a tenth part of the dramatic essays of George Henry Lewes; and writers like John Oxenford, Shirley Brooks, and Frederick Tomlins are buried for ever in the files of innumerable newspapers. The time will come when interest will be taken in thoughtful, analytical criticism, united or not to the pictures of contemporary performers. Meanwhile, it is encouraging to find a revived interest in the History of the Stage as told by means of official record, accurate description, and enlivening anecdote. Our Histories of the Stage are few and far between. They are not consecutive, and are, for the most part, dull. Dibden's History is a dreary book; Geneste, who begins at 1600 and ends at 1830, is invaluable in its way but clumsily done, and a mere boiling down of collected facts and scraps from playbills exhaustively ransacked; Dr. Doran, a far more entertaining and lively author, in his annals of the stage called "Their Majesties' Servants," only takes up the period embraced between the reigns of Thomas Betterton and Edmund Kean; authors of research and literary skill like Mr. Dutton Cook, Mr. Sutherland Edwards, and others, have contented themselves with reprinting their magazine articles in handy and appropriate form; and men of wide experience in the old and new schools of dramatic art, whose memories are green and healthy, such as Mr. E. L. Blanchard, Mr. George Augustus Sala, and Mr. Edmund Yates, remain silent on the stage's history between Edmund Kean and Henry Irving—an invaluable period of transition. The most industrious, as he is the most capable of stage historians is Mr. Percy Fitzgerald. He has already contributed to our theatrical bookshelves a life of Garrick; the lives of the Kembles; the principles of comedy and dramatic effect; the world behind the scenes; a romance of the English stage; and the life and adventures of Alexandre Dumas. By far the most important contribution of Mr. Fitzgerald to dramatic literature is his New History of the English Stage, 2 vols. (Tinsley Brothers), which begins boldly at the Restoration, and takes us to the liberty of the theatres from the thralldom of the patent houses, when the great dramatic revival began that has had such encouraging results. It can scarcely be believed, though it is perfectly true, as pointed out by Mr. Moy Thomas the other day, that as late as 1866 there were managers as experienced as Mr. Benjamin Webster casting a loving look back at the old protectionist days of Covent Garden and Drury Lane, and regarding the growth of amusement as the curse and degeneracy of art. Now that London teems with theatres, and they seem to spring up like mushrooms in the night, it is right that playgoers should be made acquainted by documentary evidence of the state of things that existed before liberty was acquired. For this purpose no more accurate guide can be found than Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, who has gone into the subject in a most workman-like fashion, and has produced a book of double value—an interesting romance and a book of abiding record. Take only one instance of the value of documentary evidence on matters of everyday notoriety. Every Twelfth Night we read of the cutting of Baddeley's cake at Drury Lane, and of the solemn fulfilment of the old actor's serious injunction. Mr. James Fernandez, of the Drury Lane Fund, little knew, when he was cutting Baddeley's cake this year, that by partaking of it in the saloon instead of the "great green-room" Baddeley's will was frustrated; and there is no evidence whatever that the intentions of the founder of the feast and of the Moulsey almshouses have ever been carried out in the matter of his vindictive letter against his poor wife which his executors were told "to publish every year." A man who leaves his fortune to "Mrs. Catherine Strickland, generally called and known by the name of Mrs. Baddeley," and directs that his wretched wife shall be lampooned to eternity, must have carried hatred to the grave with a vengeance. He must have been a vain, mean-spirited fellow, and to have been as anxious to advertise his cheap generosity in the green-room as to perpetuate his wretched attack on his wife originally published in the General Advertiser of 1790, in order to prevent the world from "looking on his conduct in the villainous point of view as set forth in certain books and pamphlets." What has posterity to do with the vulgar squabbles of Mr. and Mrs. Baddeley? Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's book is a handsome present to every student of dramatic art, and it will live as a text-book.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

Captain Cecchi, the intrepid African traveller, who has just returned, has had the honour of being received in private audience by King Humbert and Queen Margherita, and by His Holiness the Pope.

On Tuesday the Senate continued the debate on the bill for voting by large constituencies; and the Chamber of Deputies began the discussion of the Treaty of Commerce with France.

A telegram from the Daily News correspondent in Rome states that the city is excited about a scandal of an unprecedented nature. On Sunday evening, as the Minister of Public Instruction was looking at the excavations at the Pantheon, Professor Sbarbaro, a learned writer on international law but a most erratic man, spat in his face. The professor was arrested, and his trial is looked forward to with interest.

GERMANY.

A review took place at Wiesbaden on Thursday week. The Emperor William, with a brilliant suite of more than a hundred officers, including many generals, walked down the line of troops, and remained on foot an hour. The Emperor returned to Berlin on Monday morning, and in the afternoon received Prince Orloff, the Russian Ambassador to France, who had just returned from visiting Prince Bismarck. Tuesday being the anniversary of the battle of Gross-Görschen, the Emperor went out to Potsdam and held his customary yearly inspection of the 1st Regiment of Foot Guards, which won great distinction by its valour at the battle in question.

The ball given on Thursday week at the British Embassy, Berlin, in honour of the marriage of the Duke of Albany, was attended by the Crown Prince and Princess, all the members of the Royal family, and the Diplomatic Body. Altogether, about 300 invitations were issued.

On Thursday week the extraordinary Session of the German Parliament was opened, the speech from the throne being read by Herr von Boetticher, Secretary of State. The Emperor declared himself justified in feeling confident in the continuance of pacific and friendly relations with the other Powers. At the conclusion, three cheers were given for the Emperor.

The Upper House of the Prussian Diet has adopted the Ecclesiastical Bill as proposed by a majority of more than two thirds.

Last Saturday the trial-trip took place on a new electric railway in Berlin, and it was a complete success.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The joint sitting of the Austrian and Hungarian Delegations have adopted the reduction of 2,000,000 fl. made by the Hungarian Delegation in the vote of credit demanded for Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Finance Minister of Austria and Hungary, Herr von Szlavy, has tendered his resignation, and Herr von Kallay, who provisionally acted as Premier after Baron Haymerle's death, succeeds him. The cause of the resignation is that the Hungarian Government is anxious to have Bosnia governed by a civil administration, whilst Austria means to govern the province by military authority, in the old frontier style. Herr von Szlavy had acted against his own convictions in undertaking the administration of Bosnia whilst he was a firm opponent of the occupation.

The official account given of the encounter between the Austrian troops and the Crivosian insurgents last Saturday states that the insurgents were dispersed, and that the Austrian loss was one man slightly wounded.

RUSSIA.

Lieutenant Dauenhauser, with three seamen of the Jeannette, arrived at St. Petersburg on Monday. All the party appear in good bodily health, but the seaman Cole is completely out of his mind, and at times he becomes almost unmanageable. Dauenhauser suffers from weakness of sight, and has to keep himself as much as possible in the dark. The party have received the congratulations of the Minister of the Navy, and on Monday night the American Lieutenant dined at the German Embassy. Lieutenant Dauenhauser and the naturalist Newcomb were received on Tuesday by the Emperor and Empress at Gatchina in an audience of half an hour's duration. On Wednesday they were received by the Grand Duke Alexis.

Extraordinary measures of public safety have been decreed for the military government of Nicolajeff and Sebastopol. The Ministry of War is stated to be about to erect new forts at Warsaw and other towns.

Another supposed plot to blow up the Kremlin at Moscow during the coronation proceedings have been discovered. An offer to illuminate the building with the electric light led to the discovery; and several peasants' caps were found filled with explosives. These, it is supposed, were to be thrown into the air in greeting the Emperor.

A trial, lasting six weeks, of persons accused of embezzlement to the prejudice of the State has just concluded at St. Petersburg. Four of the prisoners, one of whom was a councillor of State, were sentenced to deprivation of their rank as members of the nobility and to exile. They are, moreover, to make good their defalcations. The other prisoners were acquitted.

Jewish emigrants continue to leave Russia almost daily, and the corn trade, which was mostly in the hands of Israelites, is drifting into a condition of confusion and disorder. In Southern Russia also the landowners are beginning to feel the consequences of the expulsion of the Jews.

TURKEY.

Said Pasha, the Premier, has been dismissed by the Sultan, and Abdurrahman Pasha, formerly Governor of Bagdad, has been appointed his successor.

A new Ministerial Department has been created by the Sultan, of which Said Pasha has been appointed head, for carrying out reforms in Asia Minor and Eastern Roumelia.

AMERICA.

The Senate has passed the Anti-Chinese Bill substantially in the form in which it was sent up from the House of Representatives. The Bill excludes Chinese immigration for ten years, beginning ninety days after the law is passed. An Anti-Chinese Convention sitting at San Francisco, composed of delegates from trade assemblies, has adopted a programme aiming at the removal of the Chinese by force if necessary.

The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Mr. Alphonso Taft as United States Minister to Austria, and Mr. William L. Dayton as United States Minister to the Netherlands.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, the essayist and philosophical writer, died at Concord, Massachusetts, on Thursday week, aged nearly seventy-nine years. His remains were laid to rest on Sunday in Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, near the graves of two of his best friends, Hawthorne and Thoreau. An unfinished MS. of a romance lay upon the coffin while it was carried from the Unitarian Church to the Cemetery. We give in the present issue a portrait and a memoir of Mr. Emerson.

Seventeen thousand nine hundred and eighty-four emigrants arrived at New York last week. Skilled labour is in great demand, and most of the emigrants leave New York immediately for situations already obtained in the West or South.

The population of the city of New York, according to the tenth Census, has been arranged in tabular form by a clerk in the Census office, in wards, by sex, nativity, colour, and age. Of the total there were born in Ireland, 198,593 white and one coloured; in Germany, 163,462 white and twenty coloured; over one third of the entire population of the city.

The New York Times publishes an elaborate review of the condition of the American crops, embracing over 1500 reports covering the entire country. They show generally that the condition is good, promising, upon the whole, an abundant harvest.

Attempts have been made to kill Mr. Vanderbilt and Mr. Cyrus Field by means of explosives. Infernal machines addressed to these two gentlemen were sent through the post, but one exploded in transit, and the official in charge at once returned with them. The packets had been left at the New York General Post Office. A third infernal machine has been found placed in a house where it was supposed Mr. Walling, the superintendent of police, resided. The machine exploded, but did little damage. The Socialists are believed to be concerned in the matter. Mr. Walling had prohibited a parade which they wished to hold on Sunday, such a demonstration being contrary to law.

The Government have sent out additional troops to suppress the Indian outbreak.

CANADA.

The Senate has adopted the Address to the Queen on the Irish question previously passed by the Dominion House of Commons.

The Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec has given his assent to a bill authorising the sale of the western section of the Quebec, Montreal, and Ottawa Occidental Railway to the Pacific syndicate.

The Manitoba Legislature was opened yesterday week by the Lieutenant-Governor, who, in his speech on the occasion, congratulated the province on the abundant harvest, and expressed gratification at the Queen's escape from assassination.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

In the Cape Legislative Council a resolution has been adopted by 14 votes to 6 advocating the abandonment of Basutoland by the Cape Government, and calling upon the Imperial Government to resume the responsibility of the administration of that country.

AUSTRALIA.

The Victoria Parliament was opened on April 25 by the Marquis of Normanby, the Governor, who in his speech on the occasion stated that the revenue of the colony had increased, and that a portion of the deficit for the last financial year had been extinguished. His Excellency also announced the introduction of several bills, none of which are, however, of particular importance.

The Arab tribes in the south of Tunis continue to make submission to the French authorities.

Roumelia has paid the balance of the tribute due to the Porte for 1880, as well as a first instalment of £5000 towards that of 1881.

A telegram from Hong-Kong states that the French have taken possession of the capital of Tongking, after a bombardment lasting two hours.

Great distress is reported to prevail on the coast of Labrador. In some places the inhabitants are said to be on the verge of starvation.

From the West Coast of Africa news has arrived of a sanguinary encounter between the natives of New Calabar and the followers of Oko Jumbo, which it was feared would develop into a war of wholesale carnage. Meanwhile trade in Bonny and New Calabar is at a standstill.

There have been tremendous snowstorms in the Alps. The Simplon is quite impassable, and the mail service has had to be suspended. An earthquake shock was felt in the Canton of Valais on Friday.

A French scientific expedition in the south of Algeria, under the escort of two companies of the Foreign Legion, has been attacked by a large body of natives, and the Europeans lost fifty killed and wounded, and all the provisions.

Lord Mayo sailed on Thursday week from the Mersey for Loanda, accompanied by Mr. Johnstone, on behalf of the Geographical Society. His Lordship intends going to Mossamedes to hunt elephants and other large game, and will be at least nine months away from England.

The Egyptian court-martial on the officers implicated in the plot against Arabi Pasha have sentenced Osman Pasha, Rifki, and thirty-nine other officers to degradation from their rank and exile to the Soudan. Ratib Pasha, who has escaped, is also degraded. The Khedive refused to confirm the sentence before seeing the minutes of the proceedings.

THE COURT.

The wedding festivities of our Royal family were brought to a painfully sudden conclusion in consequence of the lamentable death on Sunday morning of Princess Marie, wife of Prince William of Wurtemberg, the Heir Apparent, and eldest sister of the Duchess of Albany and of the Queen of the Netherlands. The bereaved parents, Prince and Princess Waldeck-Pyrmont, accompanied by Princess Elizabeth and the Hereditary Prince of Waldeck, left Buckingham Palace, immediately upon receipt of the mournful news, for Dover, en route for Germany. The King and Queen of the Netherlands left town on Monday, on their return to Holland, the reception of his Majesty by the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House on Tuesday having been set aside owing to the family affliction; but the King received a deputation from the Corporation at Buckingham Palace before his departure; and also a deputation from the Shipwrights' Company, who presented him with the honorary freedom of that guild. Princess Beatrice came from Windsor to take leave of the Queen of the Netherlands; and their Majesties were met at Victoria Station by the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Princess Louise of Lorne, the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke and Duchess of Teck, to take leave. The King and Queen travelled by special train to Queenborough, whence they embarked on board the Dutch Royal yacht Valk for Flushing.

The Queen drove to Clarendon on Monday to pay a visit of condolence to her new daughter-in-law, the Duchess of Albany, returning to Windsor in the evening. This day was also the thirty-second anniversary of the Duke of Connaught's birthday. His Royal Highness and the Duchess returned with Princess Beatrice to the castle from town. Her Majesty's dinner party included the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Grand Duke of Hesse, Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, Princess Victoria of Hesse, the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, Lady Adela Larking, Lord Ribblesdale, and the Knight of Kerry.

Earl Granville had an audience of the Queen on Tuesday, and on Wednesday her Majesty held a Council. Her Majesty goes to Epping Forest to-day (Saturday).

The first State Ball at Buckingham Palace is fixed for the 17th, and the first State Concert for the 26th.

The Queen sent a wreath to be placed on the grave at Highgate cemetery of Mrs. Lilly, who died last week in her ninety-second year. She had attended as monthly nurse at the birth of all her Majesty's children.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

At the dinner given by the Prince and Princess of Wales to the King and Queen of the Netherlands yesterday week, at Marlborough House, covers were laid for forty-two; the Royal circle who met their Majesties including the Duchess of Edinburgh, the Grand Duke of Hesse, the Crown Prince of Denmark, the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar. The band of the Royal Horse Guards played during dinner. At the large evening party afterwards were present the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Prince and Princess Christian, the Reigning Prince and Princess of Waldeck and Pyrmont, Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, the Hereditary Prince of Waldeck and Pyrmont, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, and the Prince of Benthaim and Steinfurt. The Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz were unable to accept their Royal Highnesses' invitation. An interchange of visits was made on Saturday between the various Royal personages in town, the Prince dining, as usual, at the Royal Academy banquet. On Sunday their Royal Highnesses attended Divine service, and Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha dined with them. The Princess and the Crown Prince of Denmark went to the Comedy Theatre on Tuesday evening.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales arrived at Damascus last Saturday. Their Royal Highnesses entertained the Governor and the Military Commandant at Damascus at dinner, and on Sunday they dined with the Governor at the house of Said Pasha, a distinguished resident in Damascus. The Princes left on Tuesday for Baalbec.

The Duke of Edinburgh presided yesterday week at a banquet given to Sir Henry Parkes, Premier of New South Wales, at Willis's Rooms. His Royal Highness presided on Tuesday at the inauguration of the International Competitive Exhibition of Ship Models at Fishmongers' Hall, which has been organised by the Shipwrights' Company. The Duke and Duchess went to the Olympic Theatre in the evening.

The Duke of Cambridge went to Kingston-on-Thames on May-Day and unveiled the Shrubsole Memorial, a drinking-fountain, which had been erected to the memory of the late Mayor, and also opened the Industrial and Fine Art Exhibition. The Duke was afterwards entertained at luncheon at the Townhall. A guard of honour of the Kingston and Richmond Volunteers was on duty.

Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha attended Divine service at the Jesuit Church, Farm-street, Berkeley-square, on Sunday, and in the afternoon went to the Zoological Society's Gardens. Their Royal Highnesses have dined with their several Royal relatives, and have exchanged visits with numerous friends. They have also patronised the Opera, and have visited the Royal Aquarium. On Tuesday they dined with the Duke and Duchess of Wellington.

The marriage of Lady Alice Fitzgerald, the eldest daughter of the Duke of Leinster, with Major Fitzgerald, of the Indian Military Service, Hyderabad, was celebrated on Tuesday at the parish church, Maynooth. The ladies Eva, Mabel, and Nesta Fitzgerald were bridesmaids, while Colonel Sir Owens Burne acted as best man. The presents to the bride were numerous and costly, and a number of presentations were made by the tenantry on his Grace's estates. In the evening the town was illuminated.

Last week the Bishop of Truro reopened the Church of St. Poldock, near Liskeard, restored at a cost of £1500.

During a thunderstorm on Tuesday, Wolviston parish church, situate between Stockton and West Hartlepool, was struck by lightning, and seriously cracked and shaken.

The 250th anniversary of Sion College, London-wall, was celebrated on Tuesday. The Rev. J. Russell Stock, Rector of All-Hallows the Great and Less, was chosen as President for the ensuing year.

The annual sermon in aid of the Church Pastoral-Aid Society was preached in St. Dunstan's Church, Fleet-street, on Wednesday evening, by the Bishop of Liverpool.—The annual meeting was held in St. James's Hall on Thursday, Lord Shaftesbury, president of the society, in the chair.

On Monday morning the Archbishop of Canterbury consecrated the Right Rev. J. M. Strachan, M.D., Bishop of Rangoon, and the Right Rev. B. Bree, D.D., Bishop of Barbadoes, in the chapel of Lambeth Palace, in presence of a congregation numbering 200 persons.

A bazaar in aid of the Centenary Class-room Fund in connection with West-End Chapel, Hammersmith, was held last week in the West-End Lecture Hall, Hammersmith, by Sir C. W. Dilke, M.P. The object of the bazaar was to obtain £800 for the building of new class-rooms for the Sunday schools.

A meeting of the council of the Rochester Diocesan Society was held last week at the office of the society, 26, Great George-street—the Bishop in the chair. Grants were made for living agents at the rate of £290 a year; £300 was also voted for permanent churches, and £490 for Mission buildings and sites.

Recently, the Archbishop of York consecrated a new church at Hambleton, in the parish of Brayton, near Selby. The hamlet is a small one, the population being only 530. The structure, which has been erected from the designs of Mr. Pearson, R.A., has, however, cost £2000, of which Mr. W. T. Smith contributed half.

Preaching in Westminster Abbey on Sunday afternoon on the late Mr. Darwin, the Bishop of Carlisle highly eulogised the character of the deceased philosopher. He said there was reason to believe that the attacks made upon religion in his name were contrary to his most solemn convictions, and maintained that religious faith rests upon foundations which no physical discoveries can impair.

A meeting of the subscribers to the Bishop of London's Fund was held at Willis's Rooms last week. The Bishop said, although the million which it was desired to raise for this specific fund had not been reached, besides the £658,000 which had been raised, other expenditure had been occasioned which brought the amount considerably over a million. The Archbishop of Canterbury said it was with great difficulty that they could cope with the rapid growth of the population.

On the 18th ult., the foundation-stone of a new church in the parish of Ronth, Cardiff, was laid by Lord Tredegar, in the presence of the Bishop of Llandaff. The church is to be built from designs by Messrs. Bodley and Garner, and is intended to seat 1000 persons, its estimated cost being £10,000. The building of the chancel is undertaken as a special memorial to the work of the late Vicar, the Rev. F. V. Puller, now a member of the Society of St. John the Evangelist, Cowley. At a luncheon in the school-room, there were more than two hundred guests. The population of the parish, which at the Census of 1871 was under 8000, is now reckoned at 25,000.

The anniversary festival of the Sons of the Clergy will be held next Wednesday afternoon under the Dome of St. Paul's Cathedral. The festival will be celebrated with a full choral service, in which the choir will consist of 300 voices, accompanied by the organ and a full orchestra. Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia" will precede the service. The "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis" will be sung to music by Eaton Fanning, in C; and the anthem after the third Collect will be Mendelssohn's "When Israel out of Egypt came." The Old Hundredth Psalm will be sung before the sermon, and the service will conclude with Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus." The sermon will be preached by the Bishop of Truro.—The annual dinner (tickets for which are issued by the Registrar, at the office, and by Messrs. Rivington, Waterloo-place, S.W.) will take place on the same day, in Merchant Taylors' Hall—the Lord Mayor presiding.

The stained-glass window which has been placed in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, as a memorial of William Caxton, the first English printer, was unveiled on Sunday morning, when a sermon appropriate to the occasion was preached to a large congregation by Canon Farrar from the text, "Let there be light." The offertory was for the benefit of the Printers' Pension Fund.—It is proposed to insert a coloured glass window in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, to the memory of the late Canon Pearson.—A very pleasing and effective window, the gift of Frances Lady Hawke, representing an angel leading a child in one light, and in the other the child being carried by the angel to Heaven, has lately been erected in the church, Womersley, Yorkshire. The work is by Messrs. Mayer and Co.—A handsome memorial window has been placed in the parish church of Cottingham, to three sisters—Elizabeth, Frances, and Mary Travis, the last of whom died in November, 1879, aged one hundred years and six weeks. The window is executed by Capronière, of Brussels, and is in four lights, the two in the centre representing Christ blessing little children, the Widow's Mite and the Parable of the Good Samaritan being illustrated respectively in the other lights. A brass plate tablet bears the following inscription: "This window is erected to the memory of the three sisters by parishioners and friends, in grateful remembrance of their kindness to the poor. The first Sunday school in Cottingham was established by them in the year 1815, and other charities that have been of lasting benefit to the parish."

BENEVOLENCE AND SELF-HELP.

The anniversary festival of the British Orphan Asylum took place last week at Willis's Rooms, the Lord Mayor presiding. The subscriptions amounted to over £2000.

On Tuesday afternoon Lady George Hamilton opened a bazaar at St. Peter's Lecture-room, Belsize Park, in aid of the building fund of the South Hampstead Working Men's Club.

The trustees of the British Museum have presented the East London Postal and Telegraph Employes' Circulating Library and Literary Institute with a number of valuable works of reference.

By permission of the Duke of Westminster, a concert was given on Thursday afternoon at Grosvenor House on behalf of the Association for Relief of Ladies in Distress through non-payment of rent in Ireland.

A large party of emigrants for Canada via Liverpool took their departure from London last week by the Midland Railway. Most of the emigrants were evidently of the thrifty part of the population, the large majority being under twenty-five years of age.

An evening concert, under the patronage of Princess Mary Adelaide (Duchess of Teck), in aid of the funds of the People's Entertainment Society, was given on Tuesday evening in the Townhall, Kensington, by Mr. Ernest Hensley, who secured the valuable assistance of Lady Folkestone and other amateurs.

A bazaar took place on Tuesday at the Brixton Hall, Acre-lane, South Brixton, in aid of the Brixton Orphanage for Fatherless Girls, Barrington-road. Around the handsome hall were ranged stalls, presided over by ladies who take an interest in the institution.

The annual meeting of the friends of the Hospital for Diseases of the Throat was held on Monday at the temporary premises, where the work of the hospital is at present carried on. The report presented by the committee showed that 4700 patients were treated last year. The old building is about to be pulled down and a larger and more commodious one erected.

It has been decided that the memorial to the late Mr. J. W. Perry Watlington, chairman of the Essex Court of Quarter Sessions, shall take the form of a Convalescent Home for the County of Essex, to be called "the Perry Watlington Convalescent Home." The county magistrates also intend to place a bust of Mr. Watlington in the Grand Jury Room at the Shirehall, Chelmsford.

The annual meeting of the Metropolitan and National Nursing Association was held yesterday week at Grosvenor House. Its object is to train nurses for service among the sick poor, and much good has already been done by the society. The report was adopted, the Duke of Westminster, Sir Thomas Brassey, M.P., and other speakers appealing for funds to continue the association's operations.

The Duke of Westminster, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Bishop of Exeter, Lords Aberdare and Mount-Temple, Baroness Burdett-Coutts, Sir John Lubbock, and other distinguished persons have consented to become patrons of the recently-formed "Society for Providing Humane and Sanitary Methods of Killing Animals for Food." The society advocates public "abattoirs" and efficient inspection of existing slaughter-houses, as well as a reform in the premises and instruments used. Dr. Richardson is the president, and Mr. H. Lester is the honorary secretary, to whom communications may be made by those interested in the movement.

Upon the invitation of Lady Brand, a number of ladies and gentlemen supported the Speaker last Saturday at his house, Westminster, on the occasion of the annual meeting of the Metropolitan Association for befriending Young Servants. This association was founded in 1875 by the late Mr. Nassau Senior to meet the needs of pauper and other friendless young servant girls in London by taking care of them until they are twenty years of age. At the end of last year the association had under its care more than 1000 girls who had been discharged from the Metropolitan District (Pauper) Schools, and about 1900 others who had been placed in service through the free registry offices in different parts of London.

Sir Richard Cross, M.P., and several other members of Parliament were present on Saturday at the laying of the memorial-stone of a large block of new model buildings for Artisans' Dwellings which are in course of erection in Vine-street, Tooley-street. The buildings will cost about £50,000, and will accommodate 400 families. Sir R. A. Cross said that he thought too much compensation had been paid under the Artisans' Dwellings, Act, and the amount in the case of unhealthy dwellings to be pulled down should be limited to the value of the land and the old materials.—The Improved Industrial Dwellings Company Limited (Sir Sydney Waterlow's Company) have bought from the Metropolitan Board of Works nearly two acres of ground in Islington and the Borough. This has been cleared under the Artisans' Dwellings Acts, 1875, and building for the accommodation of about 1400 of the working class will be forthwith commenced.

The thirteenth annual meeting of the Charity Organisation Society was held on Tuesday in the Egyptian Hall of the Mansion House. The Marquis of Lansdowne, who presided, said that wisely-directed charity was undoubtedly of great advantage to all. On the other hand, charity which was not wisely directed was not only not productive of good, but was hurtful in no small degree. Charles Kingsley spoke in terms of commendation of those who made it their business to help lame dogs over a stile—that was a very homely way of putting it; but it seemed to him to express forcibly enough the proper office of that kind of charity, which he believed the Charity Organisation Society were endeavouring to promote. He moved "That the annual report of the Council be adopted; and that, in the opinion of this meeting, the objects and methods of the Charity Organisation Society are worthy of the hearty support of the charitable public, as the first organised effort to introduce a sound administration of charity upon the principles of adequate relief, careful inquiry, and the co-operation of charitable institutions and persons for the improvement of the condition of the poor." The Bishop of Bedford seconded the resolution, and Mr. E. Buxton, Chairman of the London School Board, and Mr. Holland, M.P., supported it. Mr. Loch, the secretary, addressed the meeting at considerable length, explanatory of the objects of the society. The resolution was adopted unanimously. General Sir O. Cavanagh then moved, and Mr. Grosvenor seconded, a vote of thanks to the Lord Mayor for the use of the hall, and for the kind manner in which he had supported the charity. The Lord Mayor, in reply, said there was no institution more important than the Society, for if money was to be thrown into the streets for passers-by to pick up much mischief would follow.

Among forthcoming events for a benevolent purpose the following may be noted:—His Excellency the Hon. James Russell Lowell has consented to preside at the opening ceremony, on Wednesday, the 17th inst., of Garfield House, 361, Brixton-road, Homes for Working Girls in London, founded "In memoriam" of the late President of the United States.—Sir Stafford Northcote will preside at a dinner, to be held at Exeter on June 3, in connection with the Commercial Travellers' Benevolent Institution.—Mr. Thomas W. Boord, M.P., of the firm of Boord and Son, distillers, will preside at the Anniversary Festival of the Licensed Victuallers' School, appointed to take place at the Crystal Palace next month.

We regret that we have not space to devote to reporting the May meetings, which are now in full operation. On Monday the Marquis of Cholmondeley presided at Willis's Rooms at the annual meeting of the Colonial and Continental Church Society. The Bishop of Liverpool, in moving the adoption of the report, said that the society had always followed the principles of the Evangelical party in the Church. Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Alexander Galt, and others bore testimony to the good work which was being carried on by the society.—According to the report read at the annual meeting of the National Temperance League in the evening, the military abstainers now number 25,000, while the naval branch includes 12,000 members. The League otherwise is described as in a flourishing condition.—The first meeting in connection with the anniversary of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society took place last Saturday afternoon in Exeter Hall, when a large party of the members of the connexion from town and country sat down to breakfast. Mr. E. Holden presided. Several gentlemen present gave promises to the amount of £4010 in all towards clearing off the existing debt. On Monday the annual meeting was held in the great hall, when there was a large attendance. Mr. H. J. Atkinson, the chairman, in referring to the debt, said that if the friends of the society would pay their subscriptions a little earlier there would be no necessity for borrowing to carry on the work of the missions. The meeting on Saturday had done nobly in undertaking to raise £4000, and he hoped the example then set would be followed that day. He concluded, amid loud cheers, by stating that he should be ready to turn the £100 he had promised into a cheque for £500 if the society's friends would bestir themselves to wipe off the debt. The Rev. E. E. Jenkins then presented the report, which stated that, apart from the continued depression of straitened means, the mission-work of the society had seldom presented so many encouraging signs of advance as those which have marked the history of the past year.—The annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society was held on Tuesday at Exeter Hall. The Earl of Chichester presided. The Rev. Frederic Wigram (hon. sec.) read an abstract of the report, which stated that the receipts of the year were £212,910, in addition to which there were extraordinary receipts amounting to £3225. The expenditure had been £193,515. The total number of missionaries, clerical and lay, was 260; native and country-born clergy, 226; native lay agents, 2900. The report indicated that much progress had been made—progress in the foreign mission, and certainly progress at home. Sir Bartle Frere moved the adoption of the report, and the appointment of the general committee. Having referred to the valuable work of the missionaries in Africa, he alluded to the vain fear which once laid hold of many that missionary enterprise in London would bring about political convulsions. That fear had happily passed away, and now in India the help of the missionaries had been sought by the Government for the purpose of amending the educational work in that country. The Rev. Canon Tristram seconded the motion, which was agreed to.—The annual meeting of the supporters and friends of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held on Wednesday morning at Exeter Hall. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided, and among those present were the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, and Dr. Moffatt. The receipts for the year had been £199,785, and the total issues of Bibles, Testaments, &c., at home had been 1,509,000 copies, and abroad 1,429,000.

The portrait of Lady Mary Campbell which was published in our Special Royal Wedding Number is from a photograph by Messrs. Chaucellor and Son, of Dublin.

It is understood that the site selected for the International Fisheries Exhibition of 1883 is the Royal Horticultural Gardens, South Kensington. The grounds are to be roofed for the purposes of the Exhibition, and the Royal Albert Hall will be used for conversaciones.

A bronze medal, designed to commemorate the Royal Wedding at Windsor last week, has been produced by Messrs. J. S. and A. B. Wyon, to the order of her Majesty the Queen. It shows, on the obverse side, the heads of the Duke and Duchess of Albany; on the reverse, the armorial shields of their families, each surmounted by a coronet, with a true lovers' knot above, and a scroll beneath inscribed with the date of the marriage.

BURNING OF THE ABERDEEN
MARKET BUILDINGS.

On Saturday last, at eight in the evening, a fire broke out in the old Market Buildings at Aberdeen, which were soon entirely destroyed. These buildings, which were erected forty years ago, at a cost of £30,000, consisted of galleries with stalls occupied by two hundred shopkeepers. The fire broke out in the shop of a basket-maker named Ogg. A woman and a little girl were left in charge of the shop, and it is believed that the fire was caused by the child dropping a lighted paper among some inflammable material. It was just the time when on Saturday night the greatest crowds were in the building. The people of the other shops and the visitors at once perceived their danger, and a rush was made to the staircases. In a few minutes dense volumes of smoke filled the gallery, and it was impossible for anyone to remain without the risk of being suffocated. An old man named Crichton, a street porter, was either knocked down by the rush of people or was overcome by the smoke; his body, burnt almost to a cinder, was discovered after the fire had burnt out. The shopkeepers in the lower floor made their escape without being able to save any of their effects. An illustration is seen below.

NOVELS.

Exceedingly pleasant narrative and dialogue, abounding with wit and humour and not unpregnant of wisdom, make it an easy task to peruse the three volumes entitled For Cash Only; by James Payn (Chatto and Windus), a novel in which the author is as vivacious and amusing as ever, and not less ingenious, though extravagant and purposeless. Unless, indeed, the purpose were simply to tie a knot and untie it again. And a very fantastic knot it is. The story, in fact, has a plot which, slight and precarious as it is, demands a combination of most exceptional personages and incidents. It all turns, however, upon a single, apparently trivial, point, a question whether a certain old gentleman, who lives a certain time by sheer force of will, which is not what every old gentleman can do, died before or after midnight. If he died before midnight, or, presumably, at midnight exactly, and that fact was established at the time, the plot, as it is worked out, would be impossible. So for a while everybody agrees that he died at five minutes, or as the more exact authority declares, at five minutes and a half after midnight, and his daughter thereby is entitled to be considered an heiress. Now she has the misfortune to have a half-brother; her father's son, a creation which reflects the greatest credit upon the author's power of conceiving a hateful and despicable cur; and this half-brother, after a considerable interval, comes forward with a perfectly gratuitous statement, so far as everybody but himself and the reader and a third person is concerned, to the effect that he saw his dying father get off his death-bed, but whether with the death-rattle in his throat or not there is no need to inquire, and deliberately put "back" the clock, though he ought rather to have put it on, one would say, to suit the scoundrelly half-brother's purposes. Indeed, twelve pages further on, the half-brother does say that his father put "on" the clock. But the half-brother was known to be a liar, and, therefore, it matters little which he said or which he meant, though his half-sister, if not the reader, might very well be expected to take notice of such an important discrepancy. However, the discrepancy, which will be revealed upon a comparison of page 193 with page 205 in the second volume, is no doubt a mere slip, for which the half-brother is not responsible. He simply tells a lie, which leads to some very singular consequences. But, to tell the truth, the whole episode relating to the clock is more than a little perplexing and bewildering, and so is the affair of a cheque made payable to bearer, crossed so that it can be paid only through a banker, and yet said to have been "changed" by the person whose signature is upon it, and who, having a bank, as we are told, would naturally have paid the cheque in there, as it is hard to see what advantage was gained by getting a third person to "change" it. The strength of the story is in the charming descriptions of character, especially of the heroine and of the fine fellow who loved her always and is loved by her at last, and in the sparkling conversations which the author himself keeps up under various disguises. He is always admirable for the skill with which he relieves his portraits of selfishness with a gentleman-like colouring and with gleams of humour, and on the present occasion he almost excels himself in that style of portraiture.

Influences of various kinds may, of course, accompany the taint, if it be a taint, of negro-blood, but The Rapiers of Regent's Park: by John Cordy Jeaffreson (Hurst and Blackett) is a novel in which, throughout the three volumes, the subject is treated after a fashion not likely to meet with general assent. The story resolves itself into a study of character, the character of a girl who discovers by means of a conversation carried on between servants that she has in her veins the blood of a negress, and a negress, moreover, of questionable reputation. The girl's own personal appearance convinces her that there is truth in what she accidentally overheard the servants saying, and in the solitude of her own chamber, after an outburst described with much force, she falls into a fit of unconsciousness. She is the more impressed because she has a younger sister who, though of exactly the same flesh and blood, as there is every reason to believe, exhibits no sign of African descent, is beautiful in the real European style, and, in respect of stature and looks, might be, and often is, taken for the elder of the two. This, as we know, is quite in accordance with the inscrutable ways of Nature. Whether, however, it is equally natural that the moral attributes of the two girls should be, as it is represented that they are, no less dissimilar than the physical, so that she whose exterior betrays her taint should be a perfect volcano of passionate sentiment, fiery pride, and boiling impetuosity, whilst the other remains, under all circumstances, as cold as waxwork and as calculating as one of Babbage's machines, is a question upon which there will probably be a diversity of opinion. However that may be, she who may be called the "white" sister is used throughout the story as little more than a foil to bring out more strongly the characteristics of the "black" sister. This latter is described as a strange mixture of the noble and the ignoble, of faith and unfaith, of justice and injustice, of affection and heartlessness, of resignation and revengefulness. She resigns herself, for instance, with touching sisterliness to her dreadful position when it turns out that the man whom she loves with all the devotion of her ardent temperament and who she thought had discovered her worth and returned her love has been all along paying court, in a manner which will scarcely be considered true to life and to general experience, to her sister, whom he marries. It is only when her sister is dead, and he marries again, that she thinks of vengeance; and then, indeed, wild at the idea of losing his society, which has become as the breath of life to her, she plans and executes a most diabolical and cowardly scheme of revenge, repulsive in all its details. She sticks at nothing until she has accomplished her purpose of separating husband and wife by making a perfectly innocent woman appear plainly guilty of having dishonoured her husband. And the means employed for this fiendish object are inexpressibly base, and, from the artistic point of view, decidedly clumsy. However, there is a soft spot, as has already been hinted, in this she-fiend's heart, and she relents when she finds that her designs have resulted in what she neither expected nor desired. It may be that the author, whose novel is rather clever and well written than interesting, intended to illustrate the difficulties and dangers that may be caused by the law which prohibits marriage with a deceased wife's sister, since, but for that law, it is probable that the "black" sister would have married the widower she loves; if so, his advocacy is not calculated to do much good, because the case he has chosen is too peculiar.

The Squire's Heir: by Ralph Nevill (W. H. Allen and Co.), cannot be recommended either as a clever or a skillfully-constructed novel. The different characters are hurried before the reader so quickly, and events follow one another in such rapid succession, that there is no time for any clear delineation of character. The language spoken by the "gentlefolk" (or, as the author would call them, the "aristocratic individuals") who appear in the course of the story is neither that of living people of the present day, nor of the period to which the story is assigned. Lord Hallington, when making his son known generally, and relieving him of his disguise as a painter, announces, "with a crushing dignity of manner," that "my son Viscount McLaren will be always prepared to substantiate and justify what he asserts." When De Lisle mistakes the nationality of the English squire, his wife, and his niece, the intrepid heroine, and calls them Irish, the girl scorns the aspersion in the following terms:—"I think you might have known from our accents that we are all of your own country." On another occasion she compliments Hubert Baskerville on having "grown gentlemanlike!" The hero feels, unfortunately a little prematurely, that he has reached the very pinnacle of happiness, and, as a crowning bliss, is about to be united to the woman of his choice, "with the full sanction of her aristocratic father." No one ever thinks of saying "it is," but all alike use the abbreviation, "tis." Then there are vulgarisms; and a distinct ignorance of French is displayed. However, to compensate for its many faults, the book has plots enough to satisfy the most sensational of readers, who will, no doubt, be pleasantly bewildered by the atmosphere of mystery which hangs over the story. A new plot is even developed in the five final chapters, the termination of which must not here be divulged lest it should spoil the last point of interest in the narrative. Yet one word may be added—namely, that the publication is harmless and perfectly moral in tone.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

A public hall at Midhurst was opened last week.

Mr. Thomas Scrutton, ex-manager of St. Paul's Industrial School, has resigned his seat at the London School Board.

A gale raged over the south of England last Saturday afternoon, and much damage was done to property, attended, in some places with loss of life, both inland and on the coast.

The Rev. A. F. Kirkpatrick, M.A., Fellow and Assistant-Tutor of Trinity, has been appointed Hebrew Professor at Cambridge University.

Satisfactory progress has been made in the excavation of Silchester ruins, and some curious relics have been brought to light. These include a sacrificial knife, an urn containing ashes, pieces of glass, nails, a baker's oven, and a bath.

The Merchant Taylors' School Sports, owing to the bad weather, were unavoidably postponed till to-day (Saturday), at the same time and place. The same tickets and programmes will be available.

The Rosedale property in the North Riding of Yorkshire has been bought by Mr. William Milburn, of Newcastle. The estate has an aggregate acreage of about 5500 acres, of which about 3000 acres are under cultivation.

The International Fisheries Exhibition, which opened in Edinburgh on the 12th of the past month, closed last Saturday night. It was in every respect a complete success. Between £5000 and £6000 was taken at the doors for admission from 138,000 persons.

Professor H. Alleyne Nicholson, St. Andrew's, has been appointed to the chair of natural history in Aberdeen University, vacant through the election of Professor Cossar Ewart to the natural history chair in Edinburgh University, resigned by Mr. Ray Lancaster.

At the Cheltenham Town Council meeting on Monday the Mayor presented to the council a full-length portrait of himself, which, with a testimonial of plate and an illuminated address, had been given to him by public subscription, in recognition of his having three times filled the office of chief magistrate since the incorporation of the borough, in 1876.

The King of the Netherlands during his stay in London honoured Messrs. Mappin and Webb with a visit to their West-End show-rooms, at Oxford-street, and expressed himself highly gratified with the many handsome works of art submitted for his inspection. His Majesty further honoured them with an authorisation to make use of his Royal arms.

Professor Renisch, addressing a meeting of the Victoria Institute on Monday night, developed a new theory of the formation of coal. He has come to the conclusion that coal has not been formed by the alteration of accumulated land plants, but that it consists of microscopical organic forms of a lower order of protoplasm. Plants of a higher order have contributed only a fraction of the matter of coal veins.

The annual banquet of the Royal Academy last Saturday evening was attended by an unusually distinguished number of guests. Sir Frederick Leighton, president, occupied the chair; and the speakers were—the King of the Netherlands, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, Earl Granville, the Earl of Northbrook, the Lord Chief Justice, the American Minister, and Mr. Spottiswoode.

Vice-Admiral Hall, who has been for many years connected with the Admiralty—and for the last ten as secretary—retires from office. He will be succeeded by Mr. R. G. C. Hamilton, now Accountant-General of the Navy, who becomes permanent Secretary of the Admiralty under the new order. Mr. W. Willis, Deputy Accountant-General, will, it is understood, be appointed Accountant-General of the Navy.

An explosion occurred on Monday night at Messrs. Haigh's Victoria Colliery, by which seven colliers were killed.—At the Baxterley coal-pits an explosion took place on Tuesday while a relief party was in the pit, which was on fire in one place. Mr. Dugdale, the proprietor, who was in the pit with other gentlemen, was severely burned, and is in a critical condition. The other gentlemen and many colliers were also badly burned; and it is said that nine men remain in the pit, which was still on fire at the time of the latest accounts.

The Court of Common Council last week discussed for seven hours a Report of the Markets Committee relating to the fish-market accommodation for London. A motion was carried by a majority of one to continue their opposition to the Shadwell Market scheme in the House of Lords; but a proposal to abandon the scheme to convert the Farringdon Market into a fish market in the event of the Shadwell Market Bill passing, and to claim compensation from the promoters of the latter project, was rejected by 43 votes to 36.

There has been a new departure in the Irish policy of the Government. Earl Cowper has resigned the office of Lord Lieutenant, and Earl Spencer, the Lord President of the Council, is his successor. Mr. Forster vacates the Chief Secretaryship. Earl Cowper held an undress reception at Dublin Castle on Thursday, leaving the same day for England. At a meeting of the Dublin Corporation on Monday it was resolved to present Earl Cowper with a farewell address. The address was presented by the Lord Mayor and members of the Corporation on Thursday.—Mr. Parnell, M.P., Mr. Dillon, M.P., and Mr. O'Kelly, M.P., were released from Kilmainham on Tuesday. A large number of suspects have been released. Among them are Mr. Redmond, brother to Mr. Redmond, M.P., and Mr. Stephen Cleary, of Kildare, who succeeded Mr. Boyton in the secretaryship of the Kildare Land League.

In connection with a May-Day procession of horses in New-castle-on-Tyne on Monday, at which there were 950 horses, a meeting was held in the circus, when the prizes were distributed by Baroness Burdett-Coutts. In response to a vote of thanks, the Baroness said the May-Day procession would remain engrafted in her remembrance. She believed that day's proceedings would have the effect of doing great good in the way of teaching persons to be humane to dumb animals. Mr. Burdett-Coutts also gave an address on kindness to animals.

Mr. Forbes-Robertson lectured before the Society of Arts last week to a large audience, over which Lord Ronald Gower presided. The subject was "The Cradle of Art," and this the lecturer placed in the Valley of the Nile, asserting, among other things, that all the knowledge, art, philosophy, and religion of the West can be very clearly traced to Egypt. After describing the physical aspects of the valley and its inhabitants, the lecturer went on to speak of the religious and artistic nature of the people. He was warmly applauded.

LAW.

In the Court of Appeal yesterday week the Bank of England appealed against the decision of Lord Coleridge, who had given judgment against the Bank for £500 for notes which had been stopped in consequence of their having been given for forged bills of exchange. It was also alleged that the notes in question had been fraudulently altered as to their numbers. The Court gave judgment for the bank.

Albert Young, a youth of seventeen, telegraph clerk, in the employment of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, is under remand at Bow-street Police Court, charged with addressing a letter to Sir Henry Ponsonby threatening the life of the Queen. Prisoner professed to be an Irish priest, and to have kept in check a band of conspirators who had plotted to kill the Queen and Royal family. He offered, on receipt of a large sum of money, to get them sent out of the way.

A remarkable story of fraud is reported from Plymouth. Mrs. Down is stated to have obtained sums of money from Mr. Gale during some fictitious negotiations for the sale of Buckfastleigh Abbey, which, by a course of most ingenious deceptions, she succeeded for a time in carrying on. Dr. Gale is blind, and one of the artifices of the woman was to personate in voice and demeanour a wealthy old lady, whom she alleged was willing to buy the abbey for her nephew. Frauds upon many other persons in Plymouth are also stated to have been committed by Mrs. Down.

Edgar Ritchie has been brought up at Bow-street charged with threatening to commit suicide. He had previously gone to a restaurant and ordered a substantial supper, with a bottle or two of claret, for which he could not pay, and left his coat as security. These refreshments he had had, he said, in order to screw his courage to the point of committing suicide. His friends undertook to place him under proper restraint, and he was discharged.

The trial of Esther Pay on the charge of having wilfully murdered Georgina Moore at Yalding was concluded at the Lewes Assizes last Saturday. Mr. Baron Pollock summed up, remarking that in his experience, which extended over many years, he could not recollect any case in which greater pains had been taken fairly to lay before the jury every possible piece of evidence bearing upon the momentous issue they had to try. The jury, after an absence of about twenty minutes, returned a verdict of "Not guilty."

A unanimous verdict of wilful murder was recorded yesterday week against James Walters as the result of the Coroner's inquest respecting the death of Charles Wagner, of Victoria Dock-road, Canning Town, whose dead body was found under a cliff at Ramsgate on the 2nd inst.

Thomas Fury, a convict, who confessed to the murder of a woman at Sunderland thirteen years ago, was on Thursday week found guilty at Durham, and sentenced to death.

George Henry Lamson was executed on Thursday week in Wandsworth Jail, in the presence of the officials and a limited number of representatives of the press, for the murder of Percy John, his brother-in-law, at Wimbledon, in December last. Marwood was the executioner. G. H. Lamson before his execution confessed his guilt to the chaplain of the jail and acknowledged the justice of his sentence.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION. SECOND NOTICE.

We resume our general survey of this year's exhibition at Gallery IV.—the room to which our first notice brought us. And we shall again confine our attention in the first instance to works of more salient merit, and novel interest. We pause first, then, before "The Cobbler's Shop" (344), by Van Haanen—a buxom Venetian girl at the door of a calceolaio, who is telling her the price with his extended fingers, in the Italian fashion, of a new or repaired pair of shoes she has tried on, and which she draws her skirt from her ankles to inspect. Small as it is, there is no choicer gem in the exhibition, in regard more especially to the rich yet exquisite colouring and chiaroscuro. In this last respect it is perhaps superior to the picture already noticed (176) of a Venetian dressmaker's shop at luncheon time, with the girls variously interested in a letter that one of the prettiest of their number is reading, while the padrona looks grimly on at their levity—in which the colours are a little voyant for interior effect. A picture of the interior of "A Venetian Convent in the Eighteenth Century" (370) by Eugène de Blaas, representing a performance of PUNCHINELLO for the amusement of the audience of girl novices, with superintending nuns and visitors at the grilles, is admirable for character, nicety of execution, and purity of colour. The enormous full-length portrait, by Mr. Orchardson, of Mrs. J. P. B. Robertson (377) is certainly superior to the same painter's small picture of a young couple returning from market in the honeymoon—the honey, by the way, having already turned to vinegar, judging by their expressions—which is a sketch in the peculiar light-yellowish tone which the artist often affects. It is also superior to the half-length (511) of a gentleman equipped for fishing putting a fly in his hat, to say nothing of another portrait, which we need not criticise. The lady is seated in a tapestried chamber; her fair face forms a brilliant contrast to her black velvet dress; and the general colouring is rich. Yet the modelling is woefully deficient in the searching completeness that French artists display, and which they owe to their superior training in draughtsmanship. The defect is common in the Scotch school, and is attributable to a hasty, liney method of handling which renders refinement of gradation impossible. Mr. MacWhirter's open-air "Highland Auction" (385)—the dispersion of a cottier's furniture and farm implements—has a very brilliant daylight effect, and is as strong as others here are feeble, and altogether the best picture we have seen of his for a long time. "The Yacht 'La Sirène'" (391), by J. Van Beers, is, we believe, the famous, or notorious, picture which, when we saw it in the last Brussels Exhibition, bore the damage said to have been maliciously done to it by some person unknown, in order to discover the photographic basis on which, as it was boldly asserted, the artist had worked—an incident which attracted universal attention to the picture. If this is the original the damage has been skilfully restored. The artist brought an action against one of the critics who made the assertion, and lost it, although the literal accuracy of the criticism was not proved. The figures of the lady, and the gentleman who is handing her down the steps of the jetty, and of the sailors in the boat, have certainly all the air of very minutely—"stippled" coloured photographs; and it is difficult to understand how a painter could depict figures with such extreme exactitude, and yet render the sea—which rises like a colourless opaque wall—so inefficiently. But whether the aid of the camera has been employed or not, it is a sufficient condemnation that the figures convey the impression of being coloured photographs. Such minute and mechanical finish, however dainty and flattering to the eye, is surely not art in any noble or true sense. "The Arrival at the Well" (399) is a good average example of Mr. Goodall's Oriental subjects, not of the importance of his large poetical picture of "Memphis" in the Great Room, already noticed. "Dreamers" (407), by A. Moore, shows this time three instead of one repetitions of his stock Greek maiden lolling on a couch, one of them in the same foreshortened attitude that we have seen, perhaps, a dozen times. On this occasion they are all three robed in the same lemon-coloured draperies, to the detriment of the picture as a colour "symphony" (which is not monotonous) or as decoration. We have always recognised in this artist's works a true feeling for classic style and a refined sense of colour: but what vacuity of thought does this self-iteration, which has arrested all progress in a once-promising career, not imply? "Welcome as Flowers in Spring" (418), a domestic incident in an old English interior, is startlingly bright as a work by Mr. Yeames, and its cheerfulness is far more acceptable than the lugubrious and painful large work, in Room III., of "Prince Arthur and Hubert" (204), from "King John." C. H. Poingdestre's picture of mounted Roman drovers herding their cattle, with two of the magnificent great grey bulls of the Campagna tussling in the foreground, is a very spirited piece of animal-painting. "Esther, with her Handmaidens, entering the Throne-Room of King Ahasuerus to intercede for the lives of the Jews" (457), is the second of Mr. Herbert's more important works of the year. "Homeless and Homewards" (476), by J. R. Reid, represents with sentiment too forced and obvious children trudging contentedly homewards from school, in contrast with a miserable family of itinerant minstrels. The river-side landscape is the best portion of the painting, and with the solid colouring and daylight effect catch the eye if they do not end by captivating the mind. "Floreat Etona!" (499)—the exclamation of poor Elwes to another Eton boy of the 58th, as they led the attack on Laing's Neck, is the title of Mrs. Butler's (Miss Thompson's) not very happy or important single contribution. The work is clever, and only too spirited in the action. In reference to such a disorganised charge as this, we may quote the memorable saying, "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre," frenzied audacity rather than cool bravery is suggested. "The Grey of the Morning" (506) is a not very favourable example of J. Brett's coast-scenes. The sea is of a hard blue; the mussel-covered rocks, left bare by the low tide, look too much like velvet embroidery. Although the artist's sense of the beauty of nature and the carefulness of his manipulation are undeniable, there is a certain mechanical rigidity and finality in his method (not above a suspicion of artifice) that, however intrigant to the eye, scarcely reaches the imagination. It is optically illusive rather than poetically suggestive. "Pique" (512), a young lady near a summer-house drawing on her glove in some vexation at the non-arrival of her lover, is one of Mr. Leslie's slight but pleasant pieces of eighteenth-century conventionality. The second contribution (526) by Mr. Woods, the new Associate (the first we have already noticed) represents with happy characterisation, great vivacity, and the gayest of colouring, an Italian itinerant fan-seller temptingly displaying his wares to a bevy of girls about a fountain. A large picture (533), by the rising artist, W. Christian Symons, of Margaret of Anjou, with her son, imploring the protection of the robber of Hexham, is vigorous in conception and execution, and a frank, powerful piece of colouring. With a little more refinement of thought and method the artist will do great things. Mr. Waller's picture of moss-troopers returning to their castle and their "Sweethearts and Wives"

(551)—one of the two foremost troopers fainting from a wound—seems somewhat forced or theatrical in its pathos; while the painting is not equal to that of the duel scene of last year. "The Death of Siward the Strong, Earl of Northumberland" (558), who commanded his servants to equip him in his complete war panoply in order that he should die "in harness" as a warrior, is immeasurably the best work Mr. Val Prinsep has exhibited. The composition is good, and the strong colour and execution seem to harmonise with the subject. In other minor and lighter themes, the too equal solidity of the painting and the ponderous treatment generally are misplaced.

GROSVENOR GALLERY EXHIBITION.

The exhibition at this gallery appears to be neither better nor worse than usual. Here, still less than at the Academy, is there any signal success to mark the year. A goodly array of names appears in the catalogue, but, in general, these names are appended to works of secondary importance. A few artists, however, including Messrs. Alma Tadema and Watts, have responded to Sir Coutts Lindsay's invitation rather more largely than they have contributed to Burlington House; while others, such as Professor Richmond and Mr. Holman Hunt, figure here who do not put in an appearance at all in Piccadilly. The school, popularly defined as æsthetic, and "greeny yellery," seems to be under a cloud: Mr. Burne Jones is by no means at his best; and his disciples are, metaphorically, nowhere.

Even Mr. Millais is unequal—as at the Academy. The group of the two "Children of Mrs. Barrett" (83), evinces well-sustained mastery, and the boy especially is very sweet; but in a half-length of Mrs. Whilby (68), the greyish purple background does not harmonise with the pale blue, the reverse of rich, of the dress, nor is the modelling of the features above challenge. Mr. Watts's full-length of the Prince of Wales (63) must, if we are to be candid, be pronounced a failure. The attitude has not the easy, genial naturalness, so unaffectedly combined with a bearing of due self-respect that characterises his Royal Highness, and the face is too pallid. The picture of "The Dove that returned not again" (124)—nestled in the fork of the dank, dead branches of a tree, overgrown with ivy and moss, that rises above the waters, had better, perhaps, not have been painted. There is a touch of invention in the drapery and jewels, caught on a lower branch, but the idea, in the main, seems like a weak after-thought compared with the imagination displayed in the previous picture of the dove that found no rest, flying over the great waste of the deluge that was broken only by the long lines of subsiding "swell" that told of a world's catastrophe. The portrait of Cardinal Manning is Mr. Watts's most worthy picture exhibited this year, but we miss the priestly asceticism in the expression so characteristic of the original. On Mr. Holl's portraits of Mr. J. J. Jenkins (7) and Mr. Pember (125) we need not dwell, as we shall have occasion to review the artist's more numerous portraits at the Academy. Mr. Herkomer has made a distinct advance in his portraits of Dr. Oakes (141), of Lorenz Herkomer (173), the painter's father, represented at a carpenter's bench, and who, we believe, is a skilful carver; and, best of all, of Mr. J. S. Forbes (177), the able railway magnate and picture collector. In these, as in those at Burlington House, the power of the effect and the force of the lifelike modelling are very striking; but in some instances the heads are surely colossal, and in all the characteristics appear to be exaggerated, or insisted on too demonstratively. Mr. Alma Tadema likewise appears as a portrait-painter—in a fine bust of "Mr. Barney as Marc Antony" (55), with suitable accessories, such as no painter knows better how to introduce; and in the not less excellent portrait of Herr H. Richter, the composer (59). In the artist's more familiar style are a figure of a Bacchante engaged in "A Torch Dance" (60); three exquisitely-painted female heads in profile, entitled "An Audience" (61); and "Early Affections" (54)—a young mother, with her child, whose affection is partly diverted to a doll, seated, overlooking a flowery parterre—a bit of well-imagined Roman domestic life, very brilliant in the effect of lighting. Of three or four small pictures by E. J. Gregory the most noteworthy is "A Rehearsal" (79) of private theatricals (as we see from the reflection in a convex mirror), at which a lady and gentleman are "assisting"—the former with an absorbed attention very truthfully expressed. Although, of course, very different in technique, the effect of the interior is almost as illusive as a Van Eyck. A single figure of "Claudio" (131), excellent in colour and modelling, is by another of our most rising outsiders—Mr. J. D. Linton.

In turning to Mr. Burne Jones's works, we have, as usual, to accept subjects drawn generally from classical myth or mediæval legend, and selected, it would seem, rather for their fanciful conceit than for the nobler meaning to be found underlying some ancient fables, and which might have suggestive relation to real life and human nature. Or it may be an allegorical representation of the artist's own, with emblems borrowed from, or at least conceived in the spirit of, the printers of caissons in the fifteenth century, with all their misinformed niaiseries. And always the colouring, however beautiful and harmonious as arbitrarily decorative, has little reference to nature; while the same type of face and morbid sentiment recurs, whether male or female, and under all circumstances. To the first class belongs the artist's largest picture, "The Tree of Forgiveness" (144): Demophoon is seen rushing from the almond-tree into which the pitying gods had transformed his forsaken Phyllis; and although she, starting into life again (thus causing the first blossoming of the almond), clasps him with the old love, he turns from her in fright and apparent aversion—unaccountably so, seeing that the legend, as quoted even in the catalogue, represents him to have been consumed with sorrow at her loss. The nude muscular figure of Demophoon is the worst piece of drawing and modelling we have seen by the painter. Even more absurdly unsuitable in its physical impossibilities for pictorial representation is "Perseus and the Graia" (145). To the second class—a composition such as a mediæval painter would have turned out for a marriage chest—belongs "The Marriage of Peleus" (157), with the gods rising from the feast in confusion at the unbidden entry of Discord with her golden apple, "for the fairest." "The Mill" (175), with dancing figures, is altogether inexplicable as a production of the nineteenth century. Mr. Fairfax Murray, if to be classed with this school, is one of its best disciples: his "Pastoral" (116) is rich and Titianesque in colour. Mr. Whistler is also here, and some apology may be made for the analogy he claims to exist between his suggestions of colour and the "notes," "nocturnes," "harmonies," and "scherzes" of music; but if music were never more distinct and complete in form, and its harmonies were no better than, for instance, those of the leaden "flesh colour and pink," numbered 48, it would hardly enthrall our senses.

"A King's Daughter" (65), by Mr. Heywood Hardy, is one of the best painted as well as most agreeable pictures here. The fair Princess, a gentle, graceful figure, is feeding a couple of shy gazelles; doves are at her feet, and the pleasant group is relieved against spring greenery. Mr. P. K. Morris's "Passing the Bridge" (32) is a pretty rustic idyl, the suggestions in which, of humble joys and sorrows, accord with the peaceful evening hour; it is, moreover, happier in colour and firmer in execution than the fishing-port scene here called "The Sirens Three" (104), and than the artist's pictures at Burlington House. The leading incident is that of an old grandmother leaning on the shoulder of her soldier boy, who is playing his lute to her great content. We must reserve our remarks on the remaining pictures of mark in this gallery till next week. But we may fairly admit the claim, on its own independent merit, to respectful mention in this first notice of Princess Louise's "Portrait" (73) of a lady seated holding an open book—the first work in oils by her Royal Highness we have seen. If the handling has not the assured decision of the professional practitioner, it has a tasteful reserve that is rarer, while a refined sense of colour is apparent in the hues throughout, and the flowering azaleas behind the head is quite harmoniously subordinated.

THE LATE MR. EMERSON.

The death of Longfellow has been soon followed by that of Emerson, who was, next to the poet, of all the American writers in this generation, one most highly valued by a large number of readers in this country. Ralph Waldo Emerson had probably as many disciples as Carlyle among the serious-minded English youth of thirty or forty years ago; and their early attachment to his teachings, with regard to "The Conduct of Life," was never so rudely checked and shaken, as in the case of Carlyle's disciples, by harsh and perverse tendencies of the Master, in after years, to the arbitrary exaltation of despotic or revolutionary violence, outraging the sentiments of equity and of human brotherhood. Emerson, so far from becoming a defender of slavery, an admirer of military conquest, and a supporter of aristocratic privilege, seemed to grow more of an earnest practical Reformer, philanthropist, and consistent moralist. He did not, like Carlyle, from an excessive admiration of historical figures and actions that appeal strongly to romantic imagination by their display of lawless force and vehement self-will, lose the purity and integrity of his first ideal of human virtue, and his faith in the Divine benevolence over all. Hence it was that the sympathy of an age which cherishes Liberal principles and humane dispositions, and which trusts to find them still hallowed by a true religion, was not estranged from the gentle and placid sage of Concord, as latterly it was, in a great measure, from the rugged Chelsea preacher of a less charitable creed.

Emerson had nearly reached the seventy-ninth year of his age; he had long ceased to add considerably to the sum of his well-known writings, which consist mainly of Essays and Lectures, ethical, critical, biographical, always didactic, and a few short poems, of rather mystic and sometimes enigmatic character. His life, in outward circumstance, was very uneventful, and may be narrated in a few lines.

Born May 25, 1803, at Boston, the son of a Unitarian Minister, he was educated at Harvard University, and was introduced to the same profession. Its greatest ornament, at that period, was Dr. Channing—William Ellery Channing—one of the purest and loftiest teachers in that school of religious doctrine, and one of the best English writers in the nineteenth century. Emerson became, in 1829, minister of a Unitarian meeting at Boston, but resigned that office in 1832. He visited Europe in the following year, and made the acquaintance of Carlyle. On his return to America, he declined to hold the position of a professional minister of Christianity, choosing instead that of lecturer upon social ethics and literary or biographical topics. His discourses of this class may be said to have been the staple of his life's work, being printed usually as "Essays," and not less eagerly read in England and Scotland than in the United States. "Nature," "Self-Reliance," "Compensation," "Spiritual Laws," "Love," "Friendship," "The Over-Soul," "Man the Reformer," "The Conservative," and "The Transcendentalist" were the most characteristic examples of his tone of thought and style of expression. It was a doctrine of idealism, akin to that broached in "Sartor Resartus," the outcome of Fichte's and other German philosophy, but cast in a mould of exquisite grace and refinement. "Emerson," it has been well said, "is the prophet and philosopher of young men;" he is also "the knight errant of the moral sentiment." The old man, the experienced, perhaps disappointed, man of the world, if he be a wise and good man, will never treat this generous kind of teaching with scorn.

In 1847, Emerson again came to England, and sojourned a few months at Manchester, with his friend, Mr. Alexander Ireland, lecturing there and elsewhere. He discoursed of "Representative Men," Plato, Shakspeare, Goethe, Montaigne, and Swedenborg. On his departure, we should say, his mantle fell upon the late George Dawson of Birmingham, who became the secondary Emerson of this country. Having returned to his native Massachusetts, Emerson took up his abode in the quiet little country town of Concord, and there passed the remainder of his life. He was early left a widower, with a daughter and sons, one of whom is a physician at Boston. He lived in constant association with all those eminent scholars, humourists, and critics, men of Boston, or of the Harvard University—Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Nathaniel Hawthorne, H. D. Thoreau, and the naturalist Agassiz—whose works are quite as familiar to us as they are to American readers, and quite as much prized in this country. Emerson's last visit to England was in 1873. We believe that his writings have also obtained much influence over the minds of thoughtful and earnest Frenchmen of the Republican party. They have a classical perfection of style which will ensure the favour of posterity, and some of his ideas will be best appreciated by a future generation.

Our Portrait of Mr. Emerson is from a photograph by Messrs. Elliott and Fry, of Baker-street.

THE ROYAL WEDDING.

Some account of the Marriage of Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, to Princess Helen of Waldeck-Pyrmont, was given in our last week's publication, to accompany the Portraits of their Royal Highnesses, which were engraved for the Extra Supplement. But the Marriage Ceremony took place on Thursday week, in St. George's Chapel, Windsor; and our Illustrations of the scenes which took place there were necessarily deferred to this week's Number of our Journal. The arrival of Princess Helen, on the Tuesday, with her parents, brother, and sister, who came to England by way of Flushing and Queenborough, crossing the sea in the Royal yacht Victoria and Albert, is also the subject of two Illustrations now presented to our readers. We present, moreover, a few Sketches of the departure of the newly-married Royal Pair from Windsor after the wedding, and of their arrival at Esher and Claremont, with the public demonstrations of rejoicing and well-wishing that greeted them in the neighbourhood of their future home.

The Royal yacht, which had been sent over to Flushing to convey the Prince and Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont, with their children, to the English shore, arrived at Queenborough, near Sheerness, before eight o'clock in the morning on Tuesday week. Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, attended by Admiral the Hon. C. Elliot, went down from London to meet their Serene Highnesses on board the vessel. They landed at eleven o'clock. Princess Helen, her father and mother, her sister, Princess Elizabeth, her young brother, the Hereditary Prince Fritz, and her brother-in-law, the Hereditary Prince of Bentheim, composed the Waldeck family party. They were attended by Lord Torrington, one of the Queen's Lords in Waiting, and by several German Barons and Baronesses, and other members of the small Court of Waldeck. The Mayor, Town Clerk, and Corporation of Queenborough presented an address of welcome, to which Princess Helen replied in English, "Mr. Mayor and Gentlemen,—I beg to thank you for the kind reception you have given me on coming to my English home. I can assure you that I appreciate your good wishes, and you have my hearty thanks." Prince Christian said a few words to the same effect. Miss Filmer, daughter of the Mayor, presented a bouquet to the Princess. Many of the naval and military officers of the district, including Admiral Sir Reginald Macdonald, Commander-in-Chief at the Nore, and Major-General Sir Evelyn Wood, in command at Chatham, were among those assembled to meet the distinguished visitors. They travelled in a special saloon-train by the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway to Clapham Junction, and thence by the London and South-Western Railway to Windsor, arriving there at half-past one o'clock. At the Windsor Station they were met by the Duke of Albany, with his brother, the Duke of Connaught; three of his sisters, Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), Princess Helena (Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein), and Princess Beatrice; with the Grand Duke of Hesse. The Mayor and Corporation of Windsor attended to pay their respects to Princess Helen and her family, and the town was gallily decorated. At the grand entrance of Windsor Castle, her Majesty the Queen, with one of her grandchildren, Princess Victoria of Hesse, received Princess Helen and her parents, and conducted these honoured guests to their apartments in the Lancaster Tower.

The wedding-day, Thursday week, favoured by fine weather, passed off most successfully, and drew to Windsor a numerous and distinguished company of visitors. The Ministers of State, the Foreign Ambassadors, and other invited guests of the Queen, went thither by a special train, arriving at eleven o'clock. There was a guard of honour at the Castle, formed of the Scots Guards, in the Quadrangle, with one of the 72nd Highlanders in the Castle Yard, and the 1st Berks Volunteers kept the road up the Castle Hill. In St. George's Chapel, the invited spectators of the marriage ceremony were received by the Hon. S. Ponsonby Fane, Comptroller of the Lord Chamberlain's Department, and were shown to their seats in the Knights' stalls of the choir, and in the other pews and seats. The Lord Chancellor and Lady Selborne, Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, Earl and Countess Granville, Sir William and Lady Harcourt, Earl and Countess Spencer, the Marquis of Hartington, and other Cabinet Ministers, with ladies, the Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury, Sir Stafford and Lady Northcote, Sir R. A. Cross, and other members of the late Ministry, were among the first to appear there. The Ministers and ex-Ministers, as a rule, wore the crimson Windsor uniform, but Mr. Bright wore a plain suit of black velvet. Many of the nobility were in this company, and many officers of distinction in the military and naval services. The nave of the chapel, and the western entrance, were guarded by the Gentlemen-at-Arms, and the Yeomen of the Guard.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Oxford, and Worcester, with other clergy, took their places within the rails of the altar. At twelve o'clock there was a flourish of trumpets, and Sir George Elvey played a wedding march on the organ as the first procession from the castle entered and passed up the chapel. It consisted of the Royal Princes and Princesses, and others, who were not engaged in the separate processions of the Bride and Bridegroom. After the Heralds leading the way, and several of the high officials of the Queen's Household, came their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Teck, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, the Duke of Cambridge, with Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), Prince and Princess Christian, the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Queen of the Netherlands (the bride's sister), the Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont, the young Prince Frederick and Princess Elizabeth of Waldeck-Pyrmont. The Princess of Wales was accompanied by her three daughters. She wore a dress of pale blue brocade, embossed with flowers and trimmed with silver, a jupe of antique satin, with a cloud of fine Brussels lace, and a train of brocade, richly trimmed with silver and lace, which was borne by the Countess of Morton and Miss Knollys; her Royal Highness also wore a diamond necklace. Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales were dressed in pale blue satin, trimmed in crepe lisse, and tied with broad sashes of brocade. The Royal personages were conducted to the stools placed for them on the haut pas or dais in front of the altar; the floor there was carpeted with blue velvet, and the seats were covered with blue silk damask. The chair set for her Majesty was of crimson and gold, adorned with the badge of the Garter.

The Queen entered the chapel a few minutes afterwards. She was received by the Lord Steward (Earl Sydney), and the Lord Chamberlain (the Earl of Kenmare), with the Vice-Chamberlain (Lord Charles Bruce), the Treasurer of the Household (Earl of Breadalbane) and Comptroller of the Household (Lord Kensington), who conducted her Majesty and Princess Beatrice to their seats.

The Queen wore a dress and train of black satin, embroidered with black and white chenille and pearls, and a skirt and bodice trimmed with the same Honiton lace that she wore at her own marriage, with the same wedding veil of Honiton lace for her head-dress, surmounted by the Royal Crown in diamonds. Her Majesty also wore a necklace and earrings of large diamonds, the Koh-i-noor as a brooch, the ribbon and star of the Order of the Garter, and the Orders of Victoria and Albert and the Star of India. Princess Beatrice was attired in a train and bodice of Pompadour satin trimmed with shaded roses, and a skirt of Argenton lace over salmon-coloured satin; her head-dress was of feathers, and a veil, with diamond bees; she wore the Orders of St. Catherine of Russia, the Victoria and Albert, the Crown of India, and the Saxe-Coburg and Gotha Family. The young Princess Victoria of Hesse walked beside Princess Beatrice. The Queen's train was borne by the Groom of the Robes, Mr. H. D. Erskine of Cardross, assisted by two pages of honour; the train of Princess Beatrice, by Lady Churchill. Her Majesty was preceded by the great officers of her Court, above-named, with the Clerk Marshal, Lord Alfred Paget, Sir Albert Woods, Garter-King-at-Arms, the Keeper of the Privy Purse, General Sir H. Ponsonby, the Lord in Waiting, the Earl of Dalhousie, the Gentlemen Ushers, Groom in Waiting, and an Equerry. The Queen and Princesses were followed by the Mistress of the Robes (Duchess of Bedford), the Lady of the Bedchamber (Dowager Duchess of Roxburgh), and the Master of the Horse (Duke of Westminster), with two Maids of Honour and one Woman of the Bedchamber. The procession ended with the Captain of the Yeomen of the Guard (Lord Monson), the Captain of the Gentlemen-at-Arms (Lord Carrington), the Master of the Buckhounds (Earl of Cork), the Master of the Queen's Household (Major-General Sir John Cowell), the Bearers of the Gold Stick (Lord Strathnairn) and of the Silver Stick (Colonel Burnaby), and the Comptroller of the Lord Chamberlain's Department; behind whom, as in the other processions, marched six Gentlemen-at-Arms and six Yeomen of the Guard.

The Bridegroom's procession then came in, ushered by the Chester and Lancaster Heralds; in which the Comptroller of the Duke of Albany's Household, Mr. R. H. Collins, and the Lord Steward, and the Comptroller and Treasurer of the Queen's Household, led the way for his Royal Highness; who, being slightly lame from a recent accident, walked with a stick, and was supported on the right hand by the Prince of Wales, his brother, and on the left hand by his brother-in-law, the Grand Duke of Hesse, followed by the gentlemen in attendance on their Royal Highnesses. The Duke of Albany wore the uniform of a Colonel of an infantry regiment; the Prince of Wales was attired in a Field Marshal's uniform, with many Orders and decorations. The bridegroom, after bowing to the Queen, took his seat on the right hand; the other Princes stood beside him.

The Bride's procession, including the eight bridesmaids, unmarried daughters of Dukes, Marquises, and Earls, was the last to enter, having been formed close to a temporary pavilion erected in the side aisle, for the accommodation of the bridesmaids while kept waiting. Princess Helen walked between her father, the Prince of Waldeck-Pyrmont, and her brother-in-law, the King of the Netherlands, each holding one of her hands. Her bridal dress was entirely of rich white satin; the skirt had small openings, through which masses of orange-blossom and myrtle could be seen. It was trimmed with two robings of point d'Alençon lace, the corners of which merged in the long train, which was flaked with silver, embroidered with large bunches of silver fleur-de-lys, in relief, and bordered with white satin ruchings and point d'Alençon lace. The eight bridesmaids were Lady Mary Campbell, daughter of the Duke of Argyll; Lady Ermytrude Russell, daughter of the Duke of Bedford; Lady Alexandra Vane-Tempest, daughter of the Marquis of Londonderry; Lady Blanche Butler, daughter of the late Marquis of Ormonde; Lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the late Earl of Crawford and Balcarres; Lady Florence Anson, daughter of the Earl of Lichfield; Lady Feodore Yorke, daughter of the Earl of Hardwicke; and Lady Florence Bootle-Wilbraham, daughter of the Earl of Lathom. Their dresses were of thick white satin and moiré Française; the jupes edged with small scallops, and ornamented with flounces of pearly net, and with bouquets of primroses, violets, and white heather; the bodices were ornamented likewise with stomachers of pearls and net. Each lady had two rows of pearls round her neck, and shoes with pearl buckles, and carried a bouquet of the flowers above named, with a smaller bouquet on her breast.

When the bride had taken her place to the left hand, the bridesmaids standing behind her, supported by the Lord Chamberlain and the Vice-Chamberlain, the marriage service was read by the Archbishop of Canterbury, while the sunlight shone in through the gorgeous stained-glass windows, filling the Chapel with beautiful colour. The bride and bridegroom, side by side at the altar, made the due responses to the questions put to them; the bride was given away by her father, and the bridegroom put the wedding-ring on her finger; finally the Archbishop pronounced the benediction. The Duke of Albany led his wife to the Queen, who took her in her arms, and kissed her on both cheeks; her father and mother also kissed her. The combined procession was then formed, and walked down the Chapel; the organ playing Mendelssohn's Wedding March, and the newly-made husband bowing right and left to the company, in response to their salutations.

As the Royal party came out of St. George's Chapel, and re-entered their carriages, the Duke and Duchess of Albany, as well as the Queen, received from the people outside a cordial expression of joyful and respectful goodwill. They went into the Castle, and met again in the Green Drawing-room, where the register of the marriage was signed. The Queen then received all her invited guests, and déjeuner or luncheon was served, for the Royal personages in the Dining-room, and for the other guests in the Waterloo Gallery, where the Lord Steward proposed the health of the bride and bridegroom and that of the Queen. At eight o'clock in the evening her Majesty gave a state banquet in St. George's Hall to more than a hundred guests, herself sitting at table with them. The King and Queen of Holland, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and all the Royal family were present; and the appearance of the hall, with the whole collection of gold plate belonging to the Crown exhibited on the buffets and sideboards, was very magnificent.

The newly-married Royal pair had left Windsor at a quarter past four o'clock, in an open carriage drawn by four grey horses, with outriders and an escort of Life Guards. The Queen saw them off from the doors of the Castle, waving her handkerchief as they drove away; and there was a shower of rice and satin slippers thrown after them, "for luck," by the Princes and Princesses. The people of Windsor heartily cheered the Duke and Duchess of Albany as they passed through the town and into the Long Walk. At the Royal Tapestry Manufactory there was a triumphal arch; and Mr. Henry, the Director, held up a little child, a girl three years old, to give the Princess a bouquet. Similar compliments were offered to her Royal Highness at other places along the road. In the village of Esher, more elaborate festive preparations had been made.

There was a series of beautiful arches, formed of foliage and flowers, with a floral pavilion at the turning to Claremont; the whole tastefully designed by Mr. F. J. Williamson, sculptor, and constructed by Messrs. Garrod and Pratt, of Esher. The Duke and Duchess of Albany reached the village about six o'clock; and, in the floral pavilion, received an address of congratulation from the Rector, the Rev. S. L. Warren, and the Churchwardens of the parish. His Royal Highness, in thanking them, and all the ladies and gentlemen of Esher there assembled, said of himself and of the Duchess, "We both feel the greatest satisfaction in the thought that the first days of our married life will be spent at Esher, for it is here that we shall hope, for the future, to centre our local cares and interests. We congratulate ourselves on possessing Claremont as a residence, and we hopefully anticipate spending the greater portion of our days here."

Some of the Wedding Gifts presented to the Duke of Albany upon this pleasant occasion will be found represented among our minor Illustrations. A number of Scottish noblemen and gentlemen, personal friends of his Royal Highness, gave him a star of enamel and diamonds, the badge of the Ancient National Order of the Thistle; also a handsome centrepiece for the table, a richly chased silver plateau, surmounted by a large and finely chased silver candelabrum with branches for ten lights, and sculptured at the base with a fine group of dogs and stag at bay. members of the Christ Church College Society at Oxford University presented his Royal Highness with a pair of massive silver candelabra, weighing 445 oz., and elaborately chased. Both these and the Scottish gifts were supplied by Messrs. Frazer and Haws, silversmiths and jewellers, of Waterloo-place, Regent-street. The Freemasons of Oxfordshire presented to the Duke of Albany, their Provincial Grand Master, a silver casket, of Gothic design, partly gilt, and ornamented with a representation of the Grand Master's Collar and jewel, on the front panel, and, on the reverse side, with the arms of his Royal Highness; with his coronet at the top, and supporters at each corner. This casket, placed on a carved ebony stand, was manufactured by Messrs. Ortnier and Houle, of St. James's-street. The Freemasons of Wiltshire presented him with a pair of silver beakers, sixteen inches high, richly chased, and decorated with flowers and pomegranates, the manufacture of Messrs. Lambert, of Coventry-street. The director and workpeople of the Royal Windsor Tapestry Manufactory, of which Prince Leopold is the patron, gave his Royal Highness a gilt arm-chair, covered with tapestry, which displays, at the back, the initials of the names Leopold and Helen, with supporting Cupids, a coronet above, and wreaths of flowers; on the seat is a view of Windsor Castle, worked in tapestry. The persons employed in the pianoforte manufactory of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons presented a grand instrument, of the oblique form, in a very handsome ebonised case, decorated in Adams's style; this pianoforte has a compass of seven and half octaves, with a third pedal, to prolong the sound of the notes, and with other recently invented improvements. The ornamental leather card-basket, made by Mr. F. A. Deer, of Neath, Glamorgan-shire, saddler and harness-maker to the Prince of Wales, a tasteful artist who has obtained customers of the highest rank for his decorative leather-work, is shown among these illustrations. One of considerable artistic merit is the plaque of oxydised silver, executed by M. Morel-Ladeuil, at Messrs. Elkington's, for Sir Albert Sassoon, who has presented it to the Duke of Albany. Its design is copied, in repoussé work, from a piece of Windsor tapestry, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," which gained the gold medal at the Paris Exhibition of 1878.

Some of the Germans in London, natives of Waldeck or Pyrmont, have presented a handsome bracelet to the Duchess of Albany, their Princess Helen, with an address of congratulation upon her marriage.

The Royal Wedding Number, specially issued from the office of the Illustrated London News on Tuesday last, consists of two whole sheets, which contain a very complete series of illustrations, with full and minute narrative or description, of all the proceedings and features of interest belonging to this happy event; portraits of the Bride and Bridegroom, and of the eight bridesmaids; also of the Bride's parents, brother, and sisters; views of her ancestral home, of Waldeck and Pyrmont, and the Palace of Arolsen; likewise of the places and scenes of Prince Leopold's residence in earlier years—Wykeham House, Oxford, and Boyton Manor, Wiltshire; and views of Claremont, the park and mansion, his present abode; followed by illustrations of the Marriage Ceremony and of the attendant festivities, and of the jewellery and other bridal gifts to her Royal Highness. There is a Supplement, consisting of the Portraits of the Duke and Duchess of Albany, printed in colours.

OUR FEATHERED FRIENDS.

THE SPRING MIGRATION.

Spring! What tender emotions swell within us at the coming once more of Spring! Linked as it is with all that is fresh and pure, with budding leaves and the singing of birds, emblematic as it is of Love and immortal Hope, our hearts cleave to it as to no other season of the year. The flowers that have been lying so long buried in a sepulchre of their own withered leaves, again perfume the air of woodland, lane, and meadow, and, smiling upon us with strengthened loveliness, bid us in their own sweet language not to mourn despairingly for the human blossoms which have been gathered from our life's pathway. And closely linked with the flowers and the budding renaissance of Nature, is the singing of birds and the arrival in our midst of the truants who left us with the falling leaves of autumn. They have scented from afar the fresh verdure of our April woods and lanes. Something has told them, pretty things, that Spring is waiting for them, and, winging their way with dauntless energy through illimitable wastes of air, they have been arriving fast and thick ever since the beginning of the month of smiles and tears.

One of the earliest of the little aerial travellers to reach us is the sand-martin. Indeed, this little creature, the smallest of the swallow tribe, is not infrequently seen flitting about its old haunts before the winds of March have quite subsided. High river-banks, and sandpits that have large pools of water hard by, are the favourite localities of sand-martins; though we often see them in their sober garb of brown and white—back dark brown, under parts white—among the cliffs of the seashore. How interesting it is to watch a colony of them darting in and out from the hundreds of holes which pierce the sandbank, and how wonderful it seems to us that each of the dainty things, without a moment's hesitation, knows exactly the right hole to go into! Not long after the little sand-martin, comes the house-martin. This beautiful bird, whose glossy blue-black plumage on back and wings contrasts so brilliantly with the pure white of its under parts, on its arrival in England at once hastens to its old mud-built nest of the previous year; for martins, like the rest of the swallow family, pair for life, and evince the greatest attachment to the old home.

About the middle of April arrives the ever-welcome swallow. After its long journey from the distant South, it wings its course through the trackless air without chart or compass, not only to the country of its birth, but, like the martin, returns by a marvellous instinct to the very nesting-site of the previous season, which, as everyone knows, is in the roofs of barns and sheds, under the eaves of our dwellings, in chimneys, and the like. Violets and primroses may bloom, and hedgerows deck themselves in softest green; but not until the swallows have come do we feel that it is really Spring. How charming it is to watch them in their ceaseless evolutions in the air—now coursing over the corn-fields and springing meadows in their never-ending chase for insects, now skimming close to the herbage, now with rapid stroke of wing mounting the air, turning, twisting, darting, chasing each other in utter joyousness of heart, now swooping down upon the cool bosom of the river, dipping in the water, dashing the spray aside, but not for a moment ceasing in their flight, unless to hover kestrel-like above our heads, showing us for a moment the rich white-and-chestnut plumage of their under parts.

The last of the swallow tribe to reach our shores is the swift. Though the largest of the family, and the most rapid in its flight, it is rarely seen before the first week in May. It is often found in the company of swallows and martins, and delights in the cultivated districts, especially where there are some mouldering ruins of an abbey or castle, or where a cathedral or ancient church tower affords it a cranny wherein to build its nest. Clad in a dull, sombre black, and utterly devoid of the brilliant tints which we find in the plumage of the swallow and the martin, the swift, nevertheless, owing to its graceful form and unrivalled power of wing, is one of the most interesting of our feathered friends. Its dusky crescent form, its piercing screams, its strong, lofty, whirling flight, always arrest our attention. Never alighting on the ground or trees, eating, drinking, and even collecting its building materials on the wing, it floats through the air the live-long day, darkness only, and the duties of a parent, calling it to its nest.

And in these sweet, fresh days of spring come back to us most of the warblers that deserted us in October, the males making their appearance first, as a rule, in small parties of from two to half a dozen and more—a few, like the nightingale, singly, one by one. We do not hear much of their song until the arrival of their little mates; but early in the merry month of May, we are almost sure to hear, in the fresh green lanes and in our gardens, the quick and hurried notes of the whitethroat, the commonest, perhaps, of this charming family—the sweet song of the shy, unobtrusive garden-warbler—the soft, rich notes of the willow-warbler, whose delicate appearance and graceful motions, together with his plaintive trills and trustfulness, make him one of our special favourites—and other tender strains, which, however, belong rather to the woodlands than to our shrubberies and lanes.

In woods, copses, dells, and all the greenwood shades, one of the earliest to arrive is the pretty willow-warbler, already mentioned. We have not space to allude to all the sweet truants who now return to their sylvan haunts; but among those who are hurrying over to their nuptial bowers we must not forget the nightingale, which already in many a rural solitude is running over the modulations of his matchless song "with fast thick warble."

As he were fearful that an April night
Would be too short for him to utter forth
His love-chant, and disburden his full soul
Of all its music!

And in many a wood and grove, in thicket, brake, and lane, and even in our shrubberies, we hear, sooner than Philomela's, the delightful song of the blackcap, second only to the nightingale's itself in its richness of tone and varied cadences. And, among other sylvan singers, we may now, or very soon shall, hear the tree-pipit, the chiff-chaff, and the grasshopper, wood, and sedge-warblers—the sedge-warbler being found most frequently in marshy places, and in the dense under-wood which skirts the banks of pools and streams.

Early in April we see once more, in our orchards and gardens, and in copses and larger woods, the merry, restless redstart—a bird which, like the redbreast, to whom he is closely related, comes often very near our dwellings; "fire-tail" they call him in the country, because his warm-hued caudal appendage, which he is constantly jerking about as he flits to and fro, glitters in the sunlight like a dull streak of fire. Two other birds of the redbreast kind now returning to us are the wheatear, whose favourite haunts are in the heathery moors, and the shy little whinchat, which delights to hover about the outskirts of the moorland, in the coverts of gorse or "whin" which there abound. Another of the wanderers, now back again in the upland wilds, is the ring-ouzel, a bird readily distinguished by his black plumage and white cravat—a bird, by-the-way, very unlike the little wheatear and whinchat—for he belongs to the thrush family, the only one, however, of the thrushes delighting in "wildest wastes see black and bare." The ring-ouzels arrive here generally in the first week of April, sometimes in flocks of several hundred individuals; but, their long journey over, they soon separate and retire, each with his chosen mate, to their solitary haunts.

Many other interesting little aerial voyagers there are of whom we would fain say a word or two; but we have not space. And such birds as the landrail, great plover, and summer snipe, we must leave out of our category altogether, as well as the rarer visitors, such as the turtle-dove, and the beautiful golden oriole. But one bird there is, more eagerly looked for perhaps than any other of all the wanderers now returning to our seagirt shores, which we cannot dismiss thus summarily. When an April shower is over, and the sun, emerging from behind a cloud, makes the green earth so glad some that every little bird essays to sing—who is there, on such a morning, but stops every now and then to listen whether or not he hears the cuckoo's mellow shout? That double call of his may be monotonous, yet are the notes wonderfully full and soft, and, when heard for the first time in the season, surely it is only the heart of a churl that does not leap with joy. The cuckoo arrives about the same time as the swallow; but how different are the emotions called forth by the coming of these two harbingers of summer! It is the beautiful form of the one, and his graceful flight, which charms us: but the other, how very rarely we get a glimpse of him!—it is his voice, and not the bird himself, we are waiting for—

O cuckoo! shall I call thee bird,
Or but a wandering voice?

Though there is probably no bird a greater favourite, no bird has been more abused. He has been accused of joining the rapacious hawks, indeed of becoming himself a hawk, and of sucking little birds' eggs to give tone to his voice; his mate is said to be utterly destitute of maternal affection, and her young ones have been charged, not only with turning out of nest and home their foster-brothers and sisters, but, when fledged and as big or bigger than the small creatures who have reared them with wonderful love and patience, of devouring their little foster-mothers! With the exception, however, of a decided propensity the young cuckoo has of turning out of the nest its foster-brothers and sisters, the charges are nearly all false; and as to the female cuckoo laying her eggs in smaller birds' nests, it is probably not because she lacks the maternal instinct, so powerful in all the rest of the feathered race, but from anatomical deficiencies. However, let them say what they will of this mysterious bird, it is a special favourite, and is, and ever will be, the darling of the Spring.

The cuckoo's arrival is regularly preceded, some few days, by that of the wryneck, which elegant though plainly plumaged bird appears to be a link between the woodpeckers and the cuckoos. Rarely flying far at a time, and flitting somewhat awkwardly as it does from tree to tree and bush to bush, it seems marvellous how it accomplishes its long flight from Africa; the same, however, might be said of several other migratory birds. It is unsocial and solitary in its habits, though by no means a shy bird. Besides its name of wryneck, which it derives from a habit it has of constantly twisting about its head and neck, it is known in our southern and eastern counties as the "cuckoo's mate" and "cuckoo's messenger;" for just as the cuckoo is one of our harbingers of summer, so the wryneck heralds the arrival of the cuckoo himself.

W. OAK RIND.

The supply of American and Canadian food last week reached a total of 1079 cattle, 900 sheep, 7889 quarters of beef, and 2666 carcasses of mutton. Compared with the past months, they show a large increase in live stock and fresh meat.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

HISTORY OF CUSTOMS AND BELIEFS.

Dr. E. B. Tylor, F.R.S., gave his second lecture on Tuesday, April 25. He first commented on the origin of our week, composed of seven days, noticing its relation to the lunar months, and referring to Babylonian records in which mention is made of a seventh-day rest, on which work was forbidden to be done, adding that the Babylonian calendar and astronomy were gradually transmitted to Greece and thence throughout the civilised world. The Buddhists also fixed their worship-days by the four changes of the moon. Dr. Tylor next considered the origin of names of the days of the week, and alluded to the universality of the seventh day being set apart as sacred. He then discussed at some length the origin of the Latin and French names of the days of the week, and expressed his opinion that they were derived from the names of the sun, moon, and planets, according to the arrangement termed "cycling" by the astrologers. They named each day from that one of the seven planets which ruled its first hour, and thence presided over the whole day. Thus if Saturn ruled the first hour of Saturday, the first hour of the second day would fall to the sun, thence named Sunday; and so on. The planet names of the week days are found in India, &c. Dr. Tylor next traced the history of the doctrine of the four elements, which the Greeks identified with the four regular solids; and the fifth element, or quintessence, the universal ether, they represented by the dodecahedron. In Asia the elements are still reckoned as four or five. The use of the Signs of the Zodiac for the measurement of time in the far East, in ancient and modern times, was also described. Hence originated, also, the division into months and years. This system existed in Mexico before the Spanish Conquest; and the Hindoo notion of the destruction of the world by the four elements was also found in picture-writing of Mexico, thus demonstrating its early connection with the East.

PROPERTIES OF THE METALS.

Professor Dewar, in his second lecture, given on Thursday, April 27, resumed his illustrations of the amount of energy, both thermal and mechanical, evolved in the formation of metallic salts, especially shown by means of nitric acid. He then explained and illustrated the method of testing the cohesion and ductility of various metals—viz., zinc, copper, and iron—showing the change of shape of bars when subjected to degrees of pressure, varying from one ton to twenty-eight tons per square inch. Alloys were shown to behave differently to simple metals. The great oxidisability of some metals was demonstrated by lead and iron in a finely-divided state taking fire and burning when dropped into the air. The valuable application of carbolic oxide, the gas which burns with a pale blue lambent flame on the surface of a coal fire when the other gas has been consumed, was explained, and its uses in Siemens's regenerator furnaces. The latter part of the lecture was devoted to explanations of the principles involved in various processes connected with the reduction of metals from their ores, and the methods of testing the ores, to ascertain the presence of the metals in them. Among these tests sulphuretted hydrogen and borax were specially mentioned.

SOME DANGEROUS PROPERTIES OF DUSTS.

Mr. F. A. Abel, C.B., F.R.S., gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, April 28. He began by referring to the fact that finely divided combustible and inflammable materials, when mixed with air or some gases, rapidly ignite and cause explosions, varying in violence according to circumstances. Many fires, in such works as cotton-mills and flour-mills, have been ascribed to this cause, in accordance especially with the results of the investigations of Messrs. Rankine and Macadam, in regard to the destruction of the Tradeston flour-mills at Glasgow in 1878. In the valuable report of Messrs. Faraday and Lyell on the Haswell colliery explosion, in 1844, it is said that fire-damp is not the only fuel of these fires, but that coal-dust, swept by the rush of wind and flame from the floor, roofs, and walls of the works, suddenly takes fire and burns, if there be enough oxygen in the air to support its combustion. These views were repeated as new by M. Du Souich, in 1855, and others; but till recently were almost generally ignored. The Royal Commission to inquire into the causes and remedies for explosions was appointed in February, 1879; and the evidence given was rather against the idea of the power of coal-dust as an aggravating agent; but recently the investigations of Mr. Galloway and others respecting the Penygraig and Scubham disasters have shown that very minute portions of fire-damp are needed to create an explosion with coal-dust. Mr. Abel described and illustrated some of the experiments recently made by himself at the request of the Home Secretary, the results of which were generally, but not wholly, in accord with those of Mr. Galloway. Finally, he commented on various methods invented for getting coal more safely, including those of Dr. Macnab, Messrs. Smith and Moore, and his own proposal for the use of detonating agents. The discourse was illustrated by numerous experiments.

HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF POLITICS.

Mr. Frederick Pollock, M.A., LL.D., began his second lecture, given on Saturday last, April 29, by stating that the conditions of political philosophy were wanting after the destruction of the Roman Empire, and that the Middle Ages were essentially unpolitical, the one question being the controversy between the Emperor and the Pope; this came to its height in the reign of Frederick II., who nearly succeeded in obtaining both spiritual and temporal supremacy, and, in consequence, has been reprobated by the Church. The literary controversy of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries ended in a reaction to Platonic from Aristotelian principles, and the assumption of unlimited monarchy. Dante's idea of a universal monarch, in the person of a glorified Holy Roman Emperor, was commented on at some length. It was then shown that mediaevalism has no theory of a State, but only rudiments. Marsilio of Padua returns to Aristotelian principles. Machiavelli begins the modern study of politics, but he has no systematic theory; he treats of statecraft, not of the science of the State. Bodin's great work, "De Republica," published in 1576, developed by Hobbes in his "Leviathan, or the Matter, Forme, and Power of a Commonwealth," published in 1651, founded the modern theory of sovereignty—a power which is the source of law and above law, necessary to an independent State—which Parliament is in this country now, but which was not possible before the sixteenth century. Bodin leant towards absolutism, regulated by morality. After remarks on Fortescue's works, More's "Utopia," and Sir Thomas Smith's "English Commonwealth," Mr. Pollock concluded with an analysis of Hobbes' "Leviathan," with many interesting details. Hobbes made the English king sovereign in fear of anarchy and a so-called mixed government. Reaction from this took place in the eighteenth century.

The Commissioners of Sewers of the City of London will hold a meeting next week for the purpose receiving tenders for the experimental lighting by means of electricity for one year of the whole of the principal thoroughfares in the City to which the electric light has not yet been extended.

WEDDING GIFTS TO THE DUKE OF ALBANY,

EPPING FOREST.

One of the finest recreation grounds in Europe, and, perhaps, the largest and most beautiful breathing space possessed by any city in the world—for Epping Forest must be reckoned amongst the open spaces especially appertaining to our English metropolis—is, this day, to be dedicated, by our gracious Queen, to the use and enjoyment of her subjects for all time. Her Majesty has doubtless not forgotten the magnificent demonstration of loyalty and devotion which was made on the occasion, in April, 1873, of her visit to Victoria Park—a special visit made in direct response to an invitation from the Parks Preservation Society, an association which, under the active leadership of Mr. F. G. Heath, had, just before, secured the enlargement of the oasis of the poor East Londoner. After nine years the Queen again goes to visit an open space preserved—though only as the result of almost incredible efforts—for the recreation and enjoyment of the poorer section of her people; and the visit to Epping Forest—like the visit to Victoria Park—is not only made in response to an invitation from an association (the Epping Forest Fund Committee), which has signalled itself by its labours for the public good; but is, moreover, a graceful recognition, in itself, of the value of those labours.

The month of spring flowers is surely the fitting season for our gracious Sovereign to pay this promised visit—the month that comes to us with golden bloom spread by the "commonest" plants upon bordering meadow, wayside strip, and forest glade, and with an atmosphere impregnated with the indefinable sweetness that characterises our vernal blossoms. Welcome, then, thrice welcome, will our Royal Lady be to a forest which, anciently the King's hunting-ground, the free possession of the people, will henceforth be Royal in a new sense by reason of its dedication to them by her Majesty. Nature too, which welcomes all, will welcome the illustrious visitor of to-day; the budding leaves of oak and beech will, at this season, show with greater beauty against the sturdy forms which they only half cover; the delightful curly green of the hawthorn and hornbeam will be at their freshest, whilst the sweet fragrance of the "May" will add to the charm of its verdancy. Hyacinth and gorse, cinquefoil and buttercup, will lend purple and gold to the landscape; late primroses may linger in the hollows of some dingle, and even if the last anemone has drooped its fair head beneath the clustering underwood where it loves to hide and "blush unseen," the sweet little daisy is sure to crowd every available space of greensward.

With such brevity as the limits of our space enjoin, we purpose, on this auspicious occasion, to give briefly a history of the struggle, which has so happily terminated, for the preservation of Epping Forest, as well as some description, with accompaniment of illustrations, of the beautiful woods and glades which together make up one of the finest pleasure-grounds possessed by the toiling population of this country.

At a time when London was a half rural city, and miles of fields and hedges stretched where now there is almost unbroken continuity of streets, few people gave a thought to the probable needs of a future pent-up population, or dreamt that a time would come when every acre of available open space would be incalculably precious to citizens half stifled by the close surroundings of monotonous bricks and mortar. Then the great Essex forest existed in almost its ancient splendour; no greedy lords of manors preyed upon the public domain, and the disfigurement of inclosure was scarcely known throughout the broad expanse of the rolling greenwood. The rapacity of the "land robber" was destined to be the feature of a later age. London began to push out from its ancient limits, and the rapid development of the great commercial city gave increased incentive to the desire for illegal appropriation of land which would be certain to rapidly increase in value as the population became denser, and City suburbs were absorbed into the City itself.

The progress of illegal inclosure in Epping Forest is shown in a statement published by the Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry appointed in 1871. More of the forest was inclosed, for instance, between the years 1851 and 1871 than during the whole of the preceding period of 250 years. This is proved by the following report of the Commissioners, who ascertained "that before the year 1600 but six acres of the forest had been inclosed; that between the year 1600 and the year 1700 but four acres had been inclosed; that between the year 1700 and the year 1800 but seventy acres had been inclosed; and that up to about the year 1851 barely 600 acres had been inclosed; but that since that date over 3600 acres have been inclosed." In 1851 only 7000 acres remained of the once extensive Epping Forest—itsself but a remnant of the Royal Forest of Waltham, a domain of woodland that existed at least prior to the Norman Conquest; for when William of Normandy applied the forest laws to that tract of country which we moderns still call the "new" forest, it is probable that the forest of Waltham then had a "history." By a perambulation of its boundaries, made in the reign of Charles I., it was ascertained to include 60,000 acres, of which 17,000 belonged to Hainault and 43,000 to Epping. But the "waste" lands of Epping Forest amounted to rather less than 8000 acres; and it is this waste or open portion that has formed the subject of the contest for popular rights against manorial night during the period from 1871 to 1878, when the great Epping Forest Act—which represented the success of the struggle for the public—was passed.

It is quite clear that—as more than half of the quantity of land remaining open in 1851 had been illegally inclosed by the year 1871, and the process of filching was going on with astonishing rapidity when the forest defenders stepped in to prevent further robbery—there would not, in all probability, at this day, had no counter-action been taken, be a single acre left for the public. But the encroaching lords of manors in the year 1871 had to encounter two formidable oppositions—the one, the Epping Forest Fund Committee, which began a vigorous movement, inaugurated by a great public meeting on Wanstead-flats; and the other, the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London, who commenced the famous Chancery suit against the inclosers and spoliators of the forest lands. Parliament, too, in the same year, appointed the Commission of Inquiry, whose report has already been referred to. The decree of the Court of Chancery in the well-known Corporation suit was pronounced in November, 1874, when the Master of the Rolls gave judgment against the inclosers, who, he remarked, had "taken other people's property without their consent, and had appropriated it to their own use." He added that the defendants, at least as regarded the bulk of them, had "been parties to a litigation" in which they had endeavoured "to support their title by a vast bulk of false evidence."

The result of the protracted litigation, maintained with the most commendable public spirit by the Corporation of London, and of the heroic struggle carried on for years by such volunteer defenders as Mr. Francis George Heath, Mr. Frederick Young, and Mr. William George Smith, who in the press and in public meetings have persistently and with indomitable energy aided the good cause—the result, we say, of the long contest for this noble metropolitan holiday resort is, that the 3600 acres to which Epping Forest had shrunk by the year 1851 have now been nearly doubled; and her Majesty the Queen, whose gracious presence to-day is a fitting recognition of the vast amount of labour and money which have been spent in this noble work, will look upon an expanse of pleasure-ground whose value is greater than untold gold to the teeming millions of the greatest and most densely-populated city in the world.

So much for the history of this beautiful forest. Let us now briefly glance at its scenery and associations. Though it cannot, as a whole, compare with the great hunting ground of the Norman kings, where scenery can be found which is magnificent in its almost primeval grandeur, and forms of oak and beech abound in the plenitude of sylvan splendour, our metropolitan forest possesses a loveliness that few people who have not penetrated to its innermost recesses can fully realise. If a map of the Epping Forest district be taken in hand, with the public lands—whether wood or glade or open scrub—coloured green, it will give an appearance, as the eye scans its extent and follows its boundary lines northwards from Wanstead, as of a somewhat attenuated stretch of woodland. At no part, indeed, is the forest, as now preserved, quite two miles in breadth, and it is much less broad in many parts; but, wide or narrow, it extends southwards from the half town, half village of Epping for a dozen miles, opening up many a view of fine old trees and many a glade, hollow, and dingle of great beauty; whilst Epping-plain and Thornwood-common, northwards of the little town which has given its name to the forest, are also open wastes to which the public have free access.

The "happy thought" of a great lover of Epping Forest, a stout pedestrian, and the discoverer of one of its ancient camps—Mr. B. H. Cowper—has led to the formation, by the Conservators, of a green ride, which, by utilising existing bridle paths, and by bringing these forest tracks into continuity, will enable those who follow its course to see all that is best worth seeing throughout its extent from south to north. We can, perhaps, in no better way get an easy, yet comprehensive, glimpse of this beautiful recreation ground than by following, accompanied by our readers, the sylvan windings of this "green ride," resting awhile here and there to cursorily note what interesting associations may be suggested on our way.

A genial May morning is a fitting time for a forest ramble, with the air luxuriously soft—a gentle breeze stirring the fresh young foliage—with bright sunshine giving diamond light to the dew-drops which lie lightly upon the grass, and producing in the pedestrian the exhilaration and that delicious sense of joyousness which the brain-worker, perhaps, especially feels in its depth and fulness. The train has taken us to Forest Gate, and going thence, forest-wards, we pass through an avenue of chestnuts, whose great buds have long since burst from their marvellous envelopes into the huge green leaves which look so singularly refreshing in their verdant largeness. We now pass across Wanstead Flats, where the ever graceful bracken keeps company with heather, and even the "scrub" of this level space has interest for the observant naturalist. The straggling parish of Walthamstow lies away to our left. Across to the right is Wanstead, and on the same side of our route, outside the forestal limits within which we shall presently pass, are Snarebrook and Woodford.

We are nearing the lime-tree avenue—well worth a long journey by rail or on foot to see—of the famous and beautiful Bush Wood. No suburban Londoner need be told of the glory of the lime when in the golden green splendour of its early spring dress; and even the poorest city Arab, who can never get out of the great brick-and-mortar wilderness, knows how lovely is this delightful tree in joyous May. Very different, however, is the clipped and mangled lime of the suburban garden from the glorious form of this tree in its wild redbud.

But we must hasten our steps, not forgetting, however, that outside the fine lime avenue of Bush Wood are glades with scattered beech and oak and birch and poplar, and those delightful "clumps" which are the especial feature of open forest, and here include stunted hawthorn and bramble, holly and hornbeam. Our path leads us into a dingle, where forest pools are surrounded by a wild fringe of bracken and bramble, poplars and oaks, and brings us anon into Gilbert's Glade. From this point, through the manor of Higham Hills, passing Hale End, away to our left, and thence onward to Chingford by way of Eale Wood, Chingford Hatch, and Chingford Drift, our route will lie through narrow strips of undulating forest, with oak and birch, beech, hornbeam, and wild clumps of scrub and underwood scattered upon the successive glades.

"Elizabeth's Lodge" is the most interesting historical relic of Chingford—overshadowed though it is, so to speak, by the "Royal Forest Hotel." The lodge—whose humble occupier used to offer the simple refreshment now obliterated by the sumptuous fare of the modern hotel—is but a remnant of the forest dwelling which served as a hunting-box for good Queen Bess. It is said that the Maiden Queen used often to come there; and she it was—so at least tradition has it—who gave to the poor dwellers in the surrounding forestal manors the right to cut wood for winter use.

Very curious and interesting was the condition attached to the right conferred by Elizabeth upon the poor of her Royal forest. No tree was to be cut down, and no branches or twigs were to be taken at less than seven feet from the ground. But in each manor the maintenance of the privilege of "top-logging" was to be annually established in the following extraordinary way. The axes of the loppers were to be struck into the trees exactly at midnight of the 11th of November. From that time the privilege might be continued until the 23rd of the following March. It was then to cease, and could only be renewed in the following November by the punctual commencement of the practice of top-logging at midnight of the 11th of that month. The right would be lost by the smallest delay, even of a few minutes, or the failure to perform the stipulated act from any cause whatever. The privilege was given to the poor inhabitants of the manors of Loughton, Theydon Bois, Waltham, and Epping, and naturally enough became a source of annoyance to the lords of those manors, who employed various artifices to prevent the exercise of the essential conditions. In one case the ruse of inviting all the poor to a great feast on November the 11th was tried, in the hope that the pleasures of the "flowing bowl" would induce forgetfulness of the annual duty. In the Manor of Waltham the privilege was lost in that way. In Epping the Lord of the Manor himself offered not only to cut the wood in the stipulated manner, but also to have it carted to the cottages of the poor entitled to it. The offer was gladly accepted, and for a time the wood was punctually cut and delivered. But before very long the manorial magnate ceased cutting, and forbade any of the inhabitants to do so, and they thus lost the privilege. In the Manor of Theydon Bois the custom of top-logging gradually fell into desuetude, owing chiefly to the timidity of the inhabitants; but in Loughton Manor it had continued until extinguished by compensation under the provisions of the Epping Forest Act of 1878.

The ground is high at Queen Elizabeth's Lodge, and commands a forest view of great beauty. Stately oaks, too, are scattered upon noble glades; and the Great Hawk Wood, which we pass; Fairmead Bottom, into which we shall presently descend; and Little and Great Monkwoods beyond, include in their leafy recesses loveliness exceeded by few sylvan spots in our beautiful island.

When we have passed in our forest ramble the woods of Theydon Bois, away to our right, we shall skirt the picturesque and historically interesting Ambresbury Banks, the supposed scene of Boadicea's camp. Here it was that she is believed to have harangued her brave followers after she had—in revenge for the cruelty and indignity to which she and her daughters had been subjected by the Roman procurator—burnt the Roman colonies of London and Verulam and destroyed seventy thousand of the invading foe. In what is now the inclosure of Warlicks Park the spot, marked by an obelisk, is pointed out where the Warrior Queen destroyed her own life after her defeat by Suetonius Paulinus.

The forest now narrows towards Epping town, and its continuity will soon be broken by the open country. Of the town of Epping it may be said that, though it has given name and fame to a large district, it is itself a quiet, unpretending, out-of-the-way little place. Indeed, it is seen by very few visitors to the forest—notwithstanding that it is easily accessible by railway from London and its long, broad main street gives it a sleepy air. The total population of the Epping Union is over 20,000, but the inhabitants of the town are little more than a tenth of that number. It possesses, however, the usual marks which distinguish a town from a village—namely, a townhall (built in 1863, at a cost of £1700, and large enough to hold 500 persons), schools, gasworks, a bank, an Inland Revenue office, a literary institution (established in 1849), and an abundant supply of churches and chapels.

But we must retrace our steps to High Beech, which, lying away to the left of the path we have been following, includes some of the most wild and lovely parts of the whole forest—some of its noblest trees, unspoiled by the lopping woodman, and some of its finest glades, uninjured by the depredations of the unauthorised incloser. It is here, scarcely half an hour's walk from the Loughton railway station, but nearly twice the distance from the station at Chingford, that the Queen this day performs the gracious ceremonial act of dedicating the Forest of Epping to public enjoyment. A spacious amphitheatre, with seats to accommodate 2500 persons, in view of the Royal Pavilion, has been erected at High Beech. The Lord Mayor and Corporation of London will be present to receive her Majesty, and to acknowledge her kindness upon this occasion.

Touching but lightly upon even the chief points of interest in Epping Forest, we cannot, in our necessarily restricted space, do justice to the whole. But if we have induced our readers to explore for themselves what we have left unmentioned, our object will be attained. No pen can adequately describe the delight of the true lover of nature when penetrating into the innermost recesses of a forest on some genial day of spring or summer. The delicious sense of repose—so refreshing to the toil-worn man—the sweet exhalations from growing things; the music of the birds seeming as it were to make audible the otherwise pervading stillness and calm; the charm of colour from clustering blossoms (the eye, though gently stimulated by red and purple and orange, being reposed as it takes in the wealth of green); and the indefinable pleasure which comes to the mind by the feeling that such enjoyment is amongst the purest of all earthly delights.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"A Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration," by Hector Berlioz (Novello, Ewer, and Co.). This is an English translation—carefully made by Mrs. Mary Cowden Clarke—of the great work, by the celebrated French composer and critic, on an art of which he was such a consummate master. Many of his compositions owe much of their effect to the brilliant combinations and varieties of the orchestral score, in which respect Liszt and Wagner, and even Gounod, have been largely influenced by Berlioz, whose treatise is a valuable book of instruction, copious and comprehensive in its details, giving the compass and characteristics of all the instruments, and the different modes of their employment, with extracts from the works of various composers in illustration thereof. The author's essay on the duties of a conductor is appended to the treatise, the whole work having been edited and revised by Mr. J. Bennett, in this new edition, which is published in a handy and inexpensive form.

From Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. we have also a goodly assortment of music, both vocal and instrumental. The part-songs are, as usual, of great merit, including several by F. Abt, H. Hofmann, and other favourite composers. A "Bourrée" (No. 3) by E. Silas, is quaint and original; an "Élégie," and other compositions for the organ, by C. G. Verrinder, will be acceptable; as will likewise the latest number of the "Organist's Quarterly Journal," edited by Dr. W. Spark.

Messrs. Robert Cocks and Co. have recently published some interesting vocal music, amongst which may be mentioned "At the Porch," song, with pianoforte (and harmonium ad lib.) accompaniment; and "Little Tots," by A. J. Caldicott. Also some English versions of "Popular Trios for Ladies' Voices," including "Parting," by R. Schumann; and "Farewell," by Curschmann.

Messrs. Boosey and Co. forward some pleasing songs, of varied character. "My Love is Come," and "Leaving yet Loving," by T. Marzials; "In Arcady," by J. N. Hudson; "Hands all Round," by C. V. Stanford; "Good Night," by H. Clendon; "Peggy and Robin," by E. Harraden; "All in All," by F. H. Cowen; and "In a Quaint Old Village," by A. S. Gatty, deserve favourable mention.

From the house of W. Czerny we have received the following publications:—"Gold Röschen," Clavichord, by W. Meissner, a graceful and melodious piece; a "Rêverie," for violin, or flute, or violoncello, with pianoforte accompaniment, by A. Hervey, flowing and expressive; a pleasing Barcarolle, by B. Tours, arranged for violin, or flute or violoncello, and pianoforte, by W. Czerny; also several pleasing songs, of which the most attractive are "All my heart I gave to Thee," by C. Böhm; "Thine," by Phoebe Otway; and "Too late in the Market," a "Drawing-room Ditty" of much naïveté, by Franz Abt.

"Memories" is the title of a song, possessing pathos and expression, by R. Rasori, published by Lucas, Weber, and Co. From the same firm we have "Hesperus," a canon of considerable merit, by C. A. Macrone; "A Story of the Past," a simple and touching ballad, by A. Redhead; "Six Songs," from the able pen of Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew; and a Duet, for soprano and baritone, and "Welcome Spring," by A. Schlieber.

The President of the Royal College of Physicians of London has nominated Dr. Stevenson, of Guy's Hospital, to the post of scientific analyst to conduct any analyses of bodies of deceased persons that may be ordered by the Secretary of State during the year beginning May 1.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated June 4, 1880), with three codicils (dated Sept. 10, 1886, and March 18 and July 16, 1881), of Lieutenant-Colonel George Poulett Cameron, C.B., Knight of the Tower and Sword of Portugal, and a Knight of the Order of the Conception of Portugal, late of Cheltenham, who died on Feb. 12 last, was proved on March 27 last by Edward Lee Rowcliffe, the sole executor. The testator bequeaths to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland numerous war relics and articles of antiquity; and he humbly requests that H.R.H. the Prince of Wales will be graciously pleased to accept his order of the Tower and Sword, formerly that of his late Majesty George IV.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1882.

Saturday was an eventful day in the annals of 1882—a day of strange and startling contrasts. In the afternoon of sunshine after rain, the "ethereal mildness" of which was a rebuke to those who are prone to disparage the English climate, her Majesty was present at the formal dedication of Epping Forest "to the use and enjoyment of the public for all time." The ceremonial was as simple as the event was auspicious. That the Queen, so soon after the deplorable attempt on her life and the excitement of the Royal marriage, should have consented to appear in the midst of her subjects was a gracious and courageous act worthy of herself. This attractive and gigantic pleasure-garden, once "a hunting-ground for the Sovereign of this kingdom," and in our time the favourite resort of East-End holiday-makers, was being gradually inclosed by neighbouring squatters and invaded by irrepressible builders, till its area had become seriously restricted and its characteristic features were threatened with destruction. By a happy inspiration the City Corporation, which had some kind of locus standi in the case, was induced to become the champion of popular rights. Its powerful influence and resources, backed by a number of favourable legal decisions, arrested insidious aggressions. Considerable tracts of forest land were recovered from the hand of the spoiler, and the entire forest was formally placed under the protection of our Civic Parliament, with the Duke of Connaught as its Ranger. Epping Forest is now secured as "a thing of beauty and a joy for ever" for the benefit of her Majesty's subjects; or, as the Corporation address more precisely puts it, "an open space of nearly six thousand acres, extending from the confines of the metropolis for a distance of thirteen miles, is now available for public health and recreation."

An event fraught with so much future benefit to the toiling millions of London was well worthy of the special recognition of a Sovereign whose sympathy has always been evoked by aught that has tended to promote the happiness and enjoyment of the people; and her Majesty's kindness which, under the circumstances, must have involved some self-sacrifice, was cordially appreciated by the half million or more of people who, on Saturday last, were able to combine the pleasures of an open-air holiday with an act of grateful homage to their Queen. The animated scene at Chingford Station on her Majesty's arrival; the procession of carriages containing the Royal family, the Lord Mayor, members of the Corporation, and the privileged guests; the route through the heart of the sylvan forest scenery, kept by a variegated escort; and the ceremony at High Beech, where a capacious pavilion had been erected to receive the illustrious and distinguished guests, and the amphitheatre of seats was filled with favoured spectators, formed the ingredients of a picturesque panorama. Most significant of all, however, was the outer fringe of closely-packed masses of people who had poured from the East-End by rail and road, in Derby-Day fashion and numbers, and who behaved with exemplary propriety and good-humour. They were content with a passing glimpse and hearty cheer of the Queen who had come amongst them authoritatively to ratify the dedication of this grand pleasure domain to their use for all time. May 6 will be a red-letter day in the annals of the metropolis of England.

Saturday last will also be memorable for a ghastly tragedy that has sent a thrill of horror throughout the civilised world. About the time when her Majesty and the Royal family reached Windsor Castle after the auspicious excursion to Epping Forest, Phoenix Park, Dublin, was the scene of two assassinations of almost incredible barbarity and infamy. On the preceding day Lord Frederick Cavendish had arrived in the Irish capital to enter upon his duties as Chief Secretary for Ireland; the next morning Earl Spencer made his entry into Dublin amid unusual demonstrations of welcome that augured well for his régime as Viceroy of Ireland. Before night had set in Lord Cavendish and his coadjutor, Mr. Burke, the permanent Under-Secretary, who for twenty-five years had been an arduous and meritorious public servant, were murdered under circumstances of cruel atrocity within sight of the Viceregal mansion, and in view of more than one person who mistook the deadly struggle for an ordinary wrestling-match. Our readers are only too familiar with the details of the horrible catastrophe that has cost the country two valuable public servants and entirely changed the aspect of Irish affairs. After the official labours of the day, the two unsuspecting gentlemen, while engaged in conversation as they walked, were attacked by four desperadoes, who with daggers and bowie knives, furiously stabbed their victims from behind till their lifeless bodies lay prostrate on the ground, when the murderers mounted a car in waiting and drove off. The evidence given at the subsequent inquest by two bicyclists who were shortly after on the spot, as well as by other witnesses, would seem to imply that the intention of the assassins was to take the life of Mr. Burke, and that Lord Frederick, being at his side, was also sacrificed to their malignant hate.

Be that as it may—and the universal popular indignation, combined with the Government offer of a reward of £10,000, will no doubt soon unearth the miscreants, and throw more light on their ghastly doings—the news of this heartrending tragedy spread consternation and horror throughout the kingdom, in Europe, and in the United States also, where attempts, now probably regretted, have been made to enforce the release of Fenian "suspects." Sunday was a day of gloom and mourning, not in England only, but in Ireland, where a better feeling was springing up, and the "new departure" of the Government had begun to inspire some hope that the policy of repression might soon be safely abandoned. With manifest expediency, and probable sincerity, Mr. Parnell and his colleagues promptly and vehemently denounced atrocities that were perpetrated with the evident object of frustrating their conciliatory purpose, and might "entail consequences more ruinous than have yet fallen to the lot of unhappy Ireland during the present generation." Whatever may be thought of the thorough-going manifesto they have issued, it is charitable to interpret its scathing denunciation of "this cowardly and unprovoked assassination of a friendly stranger" by the present temper of the Irish people. Whatever may be said of individuals, a whole nation is incapable of hypocrisy. To well-balanced and logical minds it may appear inexplicable that those who have made light of other atrocious outrages have been so horrified with these particular assassinations. Still it is a fact that Irishmen have been deeply moved and are profoundly indignant at the Fenian murders in Phoenix Park. The evidence on the subject is incontestable. Not only in the Irish capital, but in the towns and districts where the Land Leaguers have been most in the ascendant, the whole tone of public feeling has changed. May we not accept this fact as a good augury? The Irish imagination and Irish feeling have been aroused and softened in a fashion of which we have had no recent experience. Whether it is to be regarded as a spontaneous revelation of their better nature, or an awakening caused by the appeals of the leaders, there is reason for congratulation in such a phenomenon.

Truly touching and pathetic was the scene in both Houses of Parliament on Monday night. That also was a revelation of the solemn feeling and dignified restraint which overwhelming calamity produces upon political life while its shadow still lingers. In each assembly—which subsequently adjourned as a mark of respect to the political martyrs who have fallen in the performance of their patriotic duties—the brief but tender addresses of the leaders on both sides were such as became the occasion. No more fitting and heartfelt tribute could be paid to the memory of Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke than were expressed in broken accents and with subdued emotion by Lord Granville, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir Stafford Northcote, as well as by Mr. Forster in his discriminating testimony to the entire devotion of his late colleague, the Permanent Under-Secretary, to his country's welfare. On that affecting occasion party spirit was entirely banished; and the proceedings of Monday, with or without Mr. Parnell's indignant protest against Saturday evening's fearful butchery, can hardly fail to exercise a salutary, perhaps an abiding, influence on the other side of St. George's Channel.

Now that exasperation and passion are cooling down, it has become manifest that the Ministerial proposals for dealing with the crisis are suited to the circumstances. The Prime Minister, instead of trying to punish a nation for horrible crimes which it loathes, proposes such stringent measures as are adapted to foil the "dynamite party" and crush secret societies, and perhaps—not before it is needed—to make the police force in Ireland more efficient and alert. In the present emergency Mr. Gladstone will hope for, and perhaps receive, the earnest co-operation of the Opposition in perfecting a measure which will meet the exigencies of the case. The course taken by Mr. Parnell and his followers on the occasion will be a test of the sincerity of their protests against crime and outrage. Subsequently is to follow a bill to deal with the arrears of rent, which virtually involves the "burning" question of evictions. The way in which these subjects are discussed will be pregnant with either good or ill to unhappy Ireland—for good, assuredly, if such a spirit prevails as breathes in the following extract from Earl Granville's speech on Monday night:—"The death of Lord Frederick Cavendish," said his Lordship, "has left a noble woman desolate; but may we all join with her most courageous prayers at this moment that God may influence the results of this fearful crime in a manner contrary to the hopes and expectations of the perpetrators, and that it may result in the eventual good of Ireland." Though the grave has but just closed over the remains of the lamented victims of Fenian malignity, may we not already find substantial consolation in the thought that the darkest hour precedes the dawn?

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

Citizen Henri Rochefort, of the Intransigent, may have—or rather have had—some admirers among persons of education and culture in this country who, while detesting the politics of the Commune, and shuddering at the blasphemies of the avowed atheist, have honestly done justice to the wit and humour of the satirist, and the undoubted bravery of the militant journalist, whose sword has always been ready to vindicate the assertions of his pen. But at this present writing the sentiments entertained by every honest man for Henri Rochefort should be simply feelings of horror and loathing. In two atrocious leading articles published over his signature in the Intransigent, not only has he exulted in the most revolting terms over the brutal murders of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, and glorified the perpetrators of that foul and unnatural deed; but he has openly accused the Irish landlords of being the instigators of the assassins. The Commune Rochefort has thus followed the lead set by the Fenian O'Donovan Rossa. Verily there is perfect solidarity among these gentlemen—or rather these ferocious and treacherous enemies of mankind.

M. le Marquis Victor Henri de Rochefort Luçay, apologist of murderers, speaks very glibly of his "Irish friends." M. le Marquis (or Count?) has a bad memory. I read in "Men of the Time," apropos of the Commune's plucky escape from penal servitude at Noumea: "On June 16, 1874, M. Rochefort arrived at Queenstown, where, but for the intervention of the Royal Irish Constabulary, he would have met with rough treatment at the hands of an excited mob." The editor of the Intransigent's "Irish friends" were obviously not so fond of him in '74 as he is of them in '82. Possibly, if the "excited mob" could have got at the man whom, rightly or wrongly, they thought had instigated by his frenzied writings the murder of the Archbishop of Paris and the other hostages of the Commune, they would have torn him to pieces.

How many Acts of Parliament have there been passed, I wonder, for the Coercion of this wretched island of Ireland? Only yesterday, hunting an obscure quotation through some old volumes of Sir Richard Phillips's Monthly Magazine and British Register, I came, at page 534 of the volume for 1822, upon the abstract of an Act "to Suppress Insurrections and prevent Disturbance of the Public Peace in Ireland." It provided that, in all counties proclaimed by the Lord Lieutenant as being in a disturbed state, the inhabitants were to be warned to remain in their houses between sunset and sunrise. King's Sergeants or Counsel were to preside as Chief Judges at Special Sessions, having such powers as were incident to Courts of Oyer and Terminer. Indictments were to be preferred without the intermediary of a Grand Jury; and the impanelling of a petty jury to try prisoners was left to the discretion of the Court.

Persons found abroad at unlawful hours, administering or taking seditious oaths, circulating notices calculated to excite riots, demanding money or arms, or who were found in public-houses after closing time, were to be deemed idle and disorderly, and punished with seven years' transportation. By another clause the Habeas Corpus was suspended for six months, and the Lord Lieutenant empowered to imprison persons suspected of conspiring against his Majesty's person and Government; and penalties of five hundred pounds were imposed on every person importing arms into Ireland or manufacturing gunpowder without a license.

After reading this abstract of what Irish "Coercion" meant fifty years ago, I turned to a file of the Examiner in quest of the reports of any lawless proceedings which might have justified the enactment of the somewhat drastic statute glanced at above. Aggravatingly enough, the index was wanting to the Examiner for 1822; but opening the volume at random I read, under the date of Feb. 3:—

The insurgents still prosecute their course of outrage. In the counties of Waterford and Cork arms have been demanded and houses burned. . . . On Monday, Mr. Hedges Eyre and Lord Bantry, hearing that a numerous assembly of banditti occupied some heights in the vicinity of Microom, county Cork, mustered about two hundred troops, whom they divided into different parties. . . . Mr. Eyre and Lord Bantry, with about fifteen soldiers, attacked the banditti, who were fully eight hundred in number and all armed. A heavy fire from so commanding a situation compelled the troops to retire; but, before they could carry off a wounded soldier, the villains rushed from the heights, severed his head from his body, placed it in triumph on a pike, and carried it along with them.

These "banditti" of fifty years since must have been "idle and disorderly persons" with a vengeance. The Editor of the Examiner (not Leigh Hunt, but some writer signing his contributions "Q.") was, nevertheless, strongly opposed to the Coercion Act, asserting that "existing outrages were the necessary result of extreme suffering, aided by the eternal operation of ascendancy politics and religious distinctions;" and, in conclusion, "Q." hotly protested against "the most odious and horrible authority being delegated to such a magistracy as that of Ireland, without even a pledge as to any efficient inquiry into the means of removing the origin of such baneful disorder."

The art-loving public in general, and the art-critics in particular, are unanimous in hailing as "a sweet boon" Mr. Henry Blackburn's daintily illustrated "Notes" of the Royal Academy and the Grosvenor Gallery. Stimulated by the success of Mr. Blackburn's enterprise, an ingenious French gentleman, M. F. G. Dumas, has, for the last three or four years past, published an illustrated catalogue of the Paris Salon; and of this an English translation is annually issued by Messrs. Hamilton, Adams, and Co. It is an excellent book to preserve and bind, as a memento of what has been done in the French art-world; and in process of time these collections of illustrated catalogues acquire real value.

The 1881 issue of M. F. G. Dumas' Guide states that it is authorised and approved by the Minister of Public Instruction and Fine Arts, and by the Society of French Artists. I paid a visit to a bookseller on Monday, and was told that my Dumas was not yet "out"; but to my amazement the bibliophile proffered me two rival publications, first, "Le Salon," compiled under the direction of M. E. Bernard, and illustrated by a large number of facsimiles of drawings by the exhibiting painters and sculptors; and next, "Paris-Salon, 1882," by the well-known writer on art M. Louis Enault, illustrated by forty engravings in "Phototypie." There would thus appear to be no less than three Parisian emulators of Mr. Blackburn in the field; but my perplexity in the matter has been heightened by reading in the "Echos Judiciaires" of one of the Paris papers that M. Dumas, as the "Concessionnaire" of the official catalogue of the Salon, has brought actions against two journals, the Evénement and La Revue Critique, for an infringement of his rights by publishing lists of the works of art which they consider worthiest of remark in the Salon. Fancy the Council of the Royal Academy bringing actions against the scribes who annually indite the edifying articles on "Show" Sunday and the Private Views!

In M. Bernard's "Salon" the titles of the pictures are given in French, English, and German. Some of the English is "a little mixed." What do you say to "Vue des Falaises de l'Île d'Anglesea (Pays de Galles)" anglicised as "View of the Cliffs to Anglesea's Island (country of Wales)"? "Un Brouillard à Neuilly" rendered as "A Foggy in Neuilly" is good; so is "Souvenir de la Hollande" given as "Holland's Remembrance." "La Dame de Trèfle" as "Club's Lady" is not so bad; but the bonne bouche in the way of translation is—I must give the English first—"The Little hand of Robinson's Island water side of the Marne" for "Le Petit Bras de l'Île de Robinson (Bords de la Marne)." But I will not quarrel with my Bernard. He gives me, for a matter of two francs fifty centimes, facsimile sketches of three hundred pictures and thirty-five works of sculpture in the Salon, some of them rough and hasty enough, no doubt, but all of them replete with artistic individuality, and constituting quite a Golden Treasury of composition, light and shade, and expression.

I have not had time yet to read in their entirety Mr. Serjeant Ballantine's "Experiences of a Barrister's Life," of which Mr. Bentley has, I perceive, already issued a Third Edition; but I hastily skimmed the first volume the other evening in a club library, and found the "Experiences" mighty diverting—and agreeably diverting to boot; for the Serjeant writes in a genial, generous, tolerant strain about most people and things, and seems to have liked the world as heartily as the world has liked and likes him. With Mr. Thackeray only, Serjeant Ballantine, it would appear, did not get on very pleasantly. Well, the illustrious author of "Vanity Fair" was not the easiest of mankind with whom to hold personal relations when you were only slightly acquainted with him. When you knew him well your opinion concerning W. M. T. changed completely.

I came upon one (to me) quite delightful chapter in which Serjeant Ballantine gives his reminiscences of London life and manners some forty or fifty years ago. Alluding to the then almost total absence of restaurants in London, he mentions with applause a once very well-known eating-house in Rupert-street, Haymarket, called Hancock's. This I can remember very well. It was on or near the site of the present Solferino restaurant. About 1836 there was an excellent French restaurant kept by a M. Fricour, at the sign of the New Slaughter's Coffee House (the Old Slaughter's was in St. Martin's-lane), either in Marylebone-street, behind the Regent's Quadrant, or in Brewer-street, Golden-square. Another noted French restaurant, Rouget's or Giraud's, in Castle-street, Leicester-square, close to the stage door of the Alhambra, flourished from the days of my boyhood until a comparatively recent period; while there was yet another excellent foreign cuisine to be found at Pagliano's Sablonière Hotel in Leicester-square itself, and at its south-eastern corner. The house had once been the town residence of William Hogarth, Painter, Engraver, and Philosopher; and here his widow, née Jane Thornhill, until extreme old age, sold prints from her husband's plates, until the coppers were nearly worn out, and the Royal Academy granted the brave, indigent old lady a small pension. When the Sablonière was disestablished the last trace of Hogarth's house vanished, and on its site was erected the existing Archbishop Tenison's School.

But Bertolini's. Who, among the elderly and the middle-aged, does not remember Bertolini's Franco-Italian restaurant, the Hotel Newton, in St. Martin's-street, Leicester-square? The house had been the residence of the illustrious Isaac of Grantham, who, when he was elected President of the Royal Society, removed to the more fashionable neighbourhood of Leicester-fields from Haydon-square, where, from its convenient vicinity to the Tower, he had lived while he was Master of the Mint. Bertolini, however, must have had a predecessor in the licensed victualling line in St. Martin's-street; for, in the self-same number of the Monthly Magazine to which I alluded just now, I find a woodcut of Sir Isaac's house, and appended to the engraving a note stating that "here he (Newton) enjoyed his honours, and passed the late years of his life." The mansion afterwards became an Italian coffee-house of celebrity, and latterly (1822) it has been converted into a national or parish school. Bertolini, then, who was at his apogee about 1848, must have succeeded to the national or parochial schoolmaster.

In that absurd "bogus" Proclamation purporting to have been issued by her Majesty the Queen, and the reading of which at the Furneaux trial excited so much merriment in court, I note these words, as a wind up:—

Marked, sealed, and witnessed by the above-signed noblemen in my presence and in presence of each other this 3rd of May, 1877.—God save the Queen.—Lord J. C. Colclough, Lord Chief Justice of H.M.C. Judicator. There is something amusingly archaic in the implication of her Majesty's Ministers putting their "marks" to an official document. We are not yet out of the wood in regard to the expression "Save the Mark"—the archery explanation is to my mind wholly unsatisfactory; and now I am exercised over Job xviii. 2, in which Bildad the Shuhite says:—"How long will it be ere ye make an end of words? Mark, and afterwards we will speak." From the context it would seem as though when a person had come to an end of his discourse it was customary for him to "mark" his conclusion, either orally, or by some gesture. Analogously, when an Indian Chief has finished his speech he utters a guttural grunt of "Wagh!" That may be his "mark;" and the Brave next in turn then takes up the rhetorical running.

In the current number of Punch there is a diverting attack on the hackney carriage known as the four-wheeled cab or "growler." The vehicle is defined as "a confined cubical box upon four noisy wheels, with two seats, which are invariably uncomfortable, and two windows, which always rattle." Mr. Punch goes on to tell us that the further peculiarities of this singular vehicle "may be summarised as consisting of nastiness and noise," and that the odour of a four-wheeled cab is "always stuffy and generally fetid; comparing unfavourably with the odour of a ragshop and a vault." As for the cabman, he is either sullen or stupid, and is not unaddicted to using "professional expletives" in the presence of ladies.

All this is too true; and, indeed, a great deal more might be said in disparagement of the "growler," which is only the old hackney-coach writ small, and with one instead of two horses. But, at the same time, please to accept this modest plea in extenuation from one who has ridden in the hackney-carriages of very nearly all the great cities in the civilised world. I will take it that your name is Benedick, the married man; and that, as you are only a junior official, as yet, in the Tape and Sealing-Wax Office (robes à queue are so frightfully expensive), you do not keep a brougham. Now, you all live in Montague-place, Russell-square; and you are going down to stay a fortnight with some friends, say, at Pangbourne or Streatley. You are accompanied by your stately spouse Beatrice d'Este; by your eldest son and heir, Hannibal Heliogabalus, aged three; your second son, Luoullus Oviparus, aged two; and your baby girl, Francesca di Rimini Dantesca, aged two months. One of those same despised and vilified four-wheeled cabs will hold yourself, your wife, your olive-branches, and the nurse; and there is no reason why Buttons, your page-boy, should not be perched on the box, by the side of the driver, and accompany you to the Paddington terminus of the Great Western Railway. Finally, on the roof of the "growler" may be piled an astonishing quantity of luggage.

Per contra, I arrived, only the other day, at early morning at the Paris terminus of the Chemin de Fer du Nord, accompanied by only one person and with only one moderately sized trunk and one portmanteau as luggage. I was not bound for an hotel having an omnibus or omnibuses of its own; and I had to wait twenty-seven minutes before the sedulously fed railway porters could catch for me, in the adjoining Rue Lafayette, a cab capable of carrying any luggage at all. The most recently started vehicles of the Compagnie Générale des Petites Voitures are uncomfortable little yellow coupés with convex roofs, on which no trunk could remain in safety, and which are without luggage guards. At last, when I was beginning seriously to think of leaving our baggage in the cloak-room and walking to the hotel the porters found us an open victoria, the driver of which was a civil fellow enough, and piled our impedimenta on his box; but the portmanteau tumbled off and into the gutter in the Rue du Faubourg Montmartre; and, had it not been a "warranted solid leather" would have come to irremediable grief. Oh! for a homely "growler" on that April morn.

Mem.: There is one perfectly comfortable, clean, and elegant hackney carriage to be found in Europe. Its tariff of fares is very moderate. The driver is always polite, and the carriage will convey any quantity of luggage. This perfect vehicle is called a gondola.

No, I thank you kindly; I have not seen the grand Wagnerian lyrical pantomime at Her Majesty's. Operatic performances in "cycles" are not for "the likes of me." They are "rather too rich," as the young lady remarked to the pastrycook with reference to the pork pie, which was all fat. I am obliged, nevertheless, to the critic of one of the daily papers who observes of a certain Dead March in one of the "cycles" that, "far better than being a thematic epitome of the hero's life, it is a glorious specimen of emotional music." Thanks for "thematic." I have inscribed it between "them" and "theme" in my "Roget's Thesaurus." I do not say there is no such word as "thematic." I am not certain about anything. But it is a brave word; and I like it.

Without entering the mystic shades of Her Majesty's, I have yet been able to follow the mystic windings of the Wagnerian epopeia by reading the Illustrated Handbook of the "Ring of the Nibelung," rendered in very fluent and ringing English verse by Mr. J. P. Jackson, author of English versions of the "Ober-Ammergau Passion Play," Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," and "Tannhäuser." Mr. Jackson is, I believe, the London correspondent of the New York Herald, and is at present far away in the wilds of Siberia, on a mission connected with the discovery of the survivors of the ill-fated "Jeannette." The "Ring of the Nibelung" is published by Mr. David Bogue, of St. Martin's-place; and in Mr. J. P. Jackson's book I read more than I can possibly hope to understand about "The Rhine Gold" and the "Valkyrie;" the "Awakening of Brünnhilde" and the—well; ahem!—the "Götterdämmerung." G. A. S.

P.S.—I learn that the crime de la crème ball at Bailey's Hotel, South Kensington, in aid of the funds of the Ladies' Work Society, which was to have taken place on Friday, May the Twelfth, is unavoidably postponed until May the Nineteenth.

THE LATE MR. JAMES RICE.

THE LATE BISHOP OF SYDNEY.
SEE PAGE 455.

SIR ROBERT HART, K.C.M.G.

THE LATE MR. JAMES RICE.

The death of this clever and successful man of letters was recently noticed. Mr. James Rice was born near Northampton in the year 1844, and was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in law. He was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in the year 1871; but his practice was very limited in extent and duration. In the year 1868, immediately after leaving Cambridge, he became proprietor and editor of Once a Week, having a young man's confidence in his own ability to turn the tide of misfortune in that ill-starred journal. The result, however, proved the contrary; the downward course of the paper having set in too strongly to be resisted. In the year 1870 Mr. Rice proposed to Mr. Walter Besant the literary partnership which has existed for twelve years. The novels of "Ready-Money Mortiboy" and "My Little Girl" appeared in Once a Week. Mr. Rice parted with the paper in 1873, and shortly afterwards became London Correspondent of the Toronto Globe. In 1879 he produced his "History of the British Turf." He was attacked in January, 1880, with blood-poisoning; from which he never completely recovered, and in the autumn of last year new and alarming symptoms appeared. For the last three months he had been confined to his house, but almost to the end his friends were sanguine of his recovery. He was married in 1870, and leaves a widow and one son. He was buried in Brompton Churchyard on Monday, May 1. Our Portrait is from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company, in which Mr. Rice and Mr. Besant are represented together.

SIR ROBERT HART, K.C.M.G.

The Inspector-General of Chinese Maritime Customs has recently been made a Knight of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. Sir Robert Hart was born at Portadown, in the north of Ireland, in 1835. He was educated at the Wesleyan Schools at Taunton, and in Stephen's-green, Dublin, and at the Queen's College, Belfast, from which he graduated in 1853. He was appointed a Student Interpreter in the British Consular Service in China in 1854; was secretary to the Allied Commission for the Government of Canton in 1858; joined the Chinese Customs Service as Deputy-Commissioner in 1859; and was appointed Inspector-General of Customs in 1863. He was President of the Chinese Commission for the International Exhibitions at Vienna in 1873, at Philadelphia in 1876, and at Paris in 1878. The Maritime Customs Department of the Chinese Foreign Office employs nearly five hundred foreigners, of many different nationalities, and 2000 Chinese; the offices of customs are about twenty in number; the collection is about £5,000,000 per annum, and the amount allowed for the support of the service—including the Coast Lights Department and the College at Peking (all of which are directed by the Inspector-General)—is about £400,000 a year. Sir Robert Hart resides at Peking, and visits the ports as occasion requires. He is a Mandarin of the highest class, and has received honorary decorations from several European Courts.

THE LATE MR. T. H. BURKE, UNDER-SECRETARY FOR IRELAND, MURDERED ON SATURDAY LAST.

RESIDENCE OF THE UNDER-SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (LATE MR. T. H. BURKE), IN PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

MURDER OF THE CHIEF SECRETARY AND UNDER-SECRETARY IN IRELAND.

A twofold murder, perpetrated last Saturday evening in Phoenix Park, Dublin, has furnished new example of the atrocious wickedness of that foul conspiracy of the enemies of civilised society—Nihilists or Anarchists, or Fenians, by whatever name they may be called in Europe or America, the same in Ireland, under cover of an agitation for different political objects—who are plotting everywhere to subvert all regular Government, for the purpose doubtless of Communistic plunder—by evoking the terrorism of assassination, by striking at the lives of distinguished rulers, now a King or an Emperor, then a Republican President, and here the Ministers or high official representatives of a Constitutional Realm. The freshly appointed Chief Secretary of the Irish Government, Lord Frederick Charles Cavendish, M.P., with the Permanent Under-Secretary at Dublin, Mr. Thomas Henry Burke, falling slain by dastardly stabbers who attacked them unawares and unguarded, not in revenge for any fancied injury, but in pursuance of the fell design to intimidate all agents of the Queen's Government in that country, must be deemed a tragical instance of the dangers besetting public personages, despite their integrity and innocence, amidst the noxious vermin of secret societies, the deadly pests of every modern State and nation, whose presence still disgraces the age in which we live.

Saturday last was the day upon which the new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl Spencer, K.G., succeeding to that great office upon the retirement of Earl Cowper, arrived from England, and made his public entry into Dublin, receiving a formal address from the Lord Mayor and Corporation of that city, and loudly cheered by the people as he rode on horseback through the streets. On arriving at the Castle the new Viceroy was received by Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster King at Arms, and the Gentleman Usher, and was conducted to the Presence Chamber, where he was received by the Lords Justices, the Duke of Leinster, the Master of the Rolls (Sir Edward Sullivan), and General Sir Thomas Steele, who sat wearing their hats under the canopy; and the Earl's secretary read the Queen's Commission appointing him to office. A procession was formed to conduct his Lordship to the Privy Council Chamber, where the ceremony of swearing him in took place. Mr. Burke, the Under-Secretary, bore the sword of State, and afterwards Earl Spencer took his seat at the council board, with his head covered, as Lord Lieutenant. Lord Frederick Cavendish was then sworn as Chief Secretary by the Clerk of the Council. A rocket from the Castle yard announced the completion of the ceremony, and a salute of fifteen guns was fired in the adjacent Phoenix Park. The Lord Lieutenant was next conducted in due procession to the Presence Chamber, where he took his seat in state; another salute, of twenty-one guns, hailed the installation of the Queen's representative in Ireland, and several official persons were presented to his Excellency, which ended the ceremonial proceedings. The new Chief Secretary, Lord Frederick Cavendish, remained in the offices of his own department, engaged in business, till past seven o'clock, when he set out for his lodge in Phoenix Park, which is about the centre of that inclosure. His Lordship went on foot. He knew the way well, for he had been there before when his brother, Lord Hartington, was Chief Secretary. He had arrived from England but at noon of that fatal day.

Mr. Burke, the Under-Secretary, left the Castle on a car some minutes later, and overtook Lord F. Cavendish about the Park gate. The Under-Secretary then got off the car, which he dismissed, and the Under-Secretary and Chief Secretary walked together on the left-hand path. It is presumed that Lord Cavendish was going merely to look in at his own house, for he and the Under-Secretary were to dine with Earl Spencer at the Viceregal Lodge. About two hundred yards from the Phoenix Column, they were murderously attacked. It was then nearly half-past seven o'clock, but it was still broad daylight. The attack was so sudden and silent that it scarcely attracted any notice. A common hackney car appears to have driven up and four fellows jumped off it, the driver remaining in his seat. Lord Frederick Cavendish was on the outside of the path, and Mr. Burke was next the grass. The assailants rushed upon them with daggers, and a fierce struggle for life took place. But the murderers killed their victims in a few moments, and then drove off by a side road in the direction of Chapelizod, and rapidly disappeared.

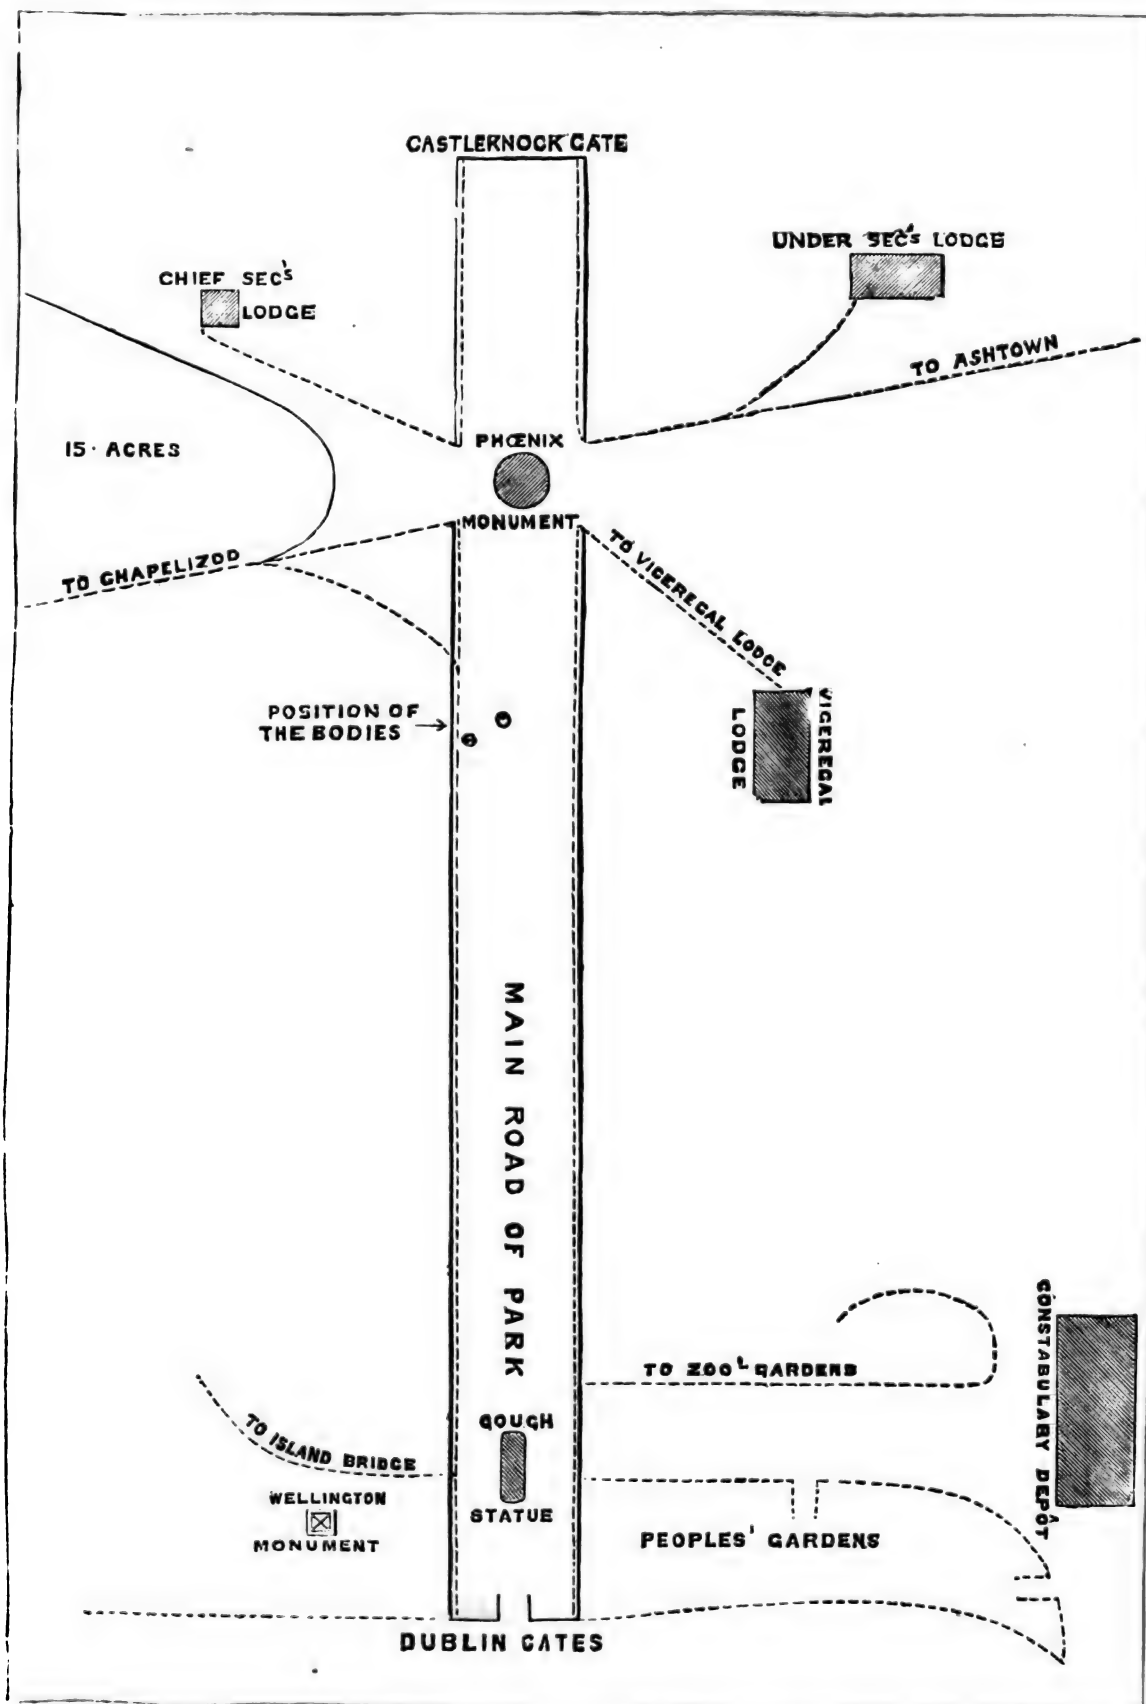

The Lord Lieutenant, accompanied by his private secretary and a servant, had ridden to the Viceregal Lodge about half an hour previously, and he had just entered his garden in front of the Lodge, when in the distance his Excellency observed a scuffle going on in the road. It appeared to him to be merely a brawl, but he gave directions that a policeman should be sent to see what it was. Little did he think that Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke were being murdered before his face.

There were other persons who saw the men, from a distance, struggling with each other, but had no idea that murder was being done. No shouts or shrieks were heard. An officer of the Royal Dragoons, Lieutenant Greatorex, was walking with his dogs, and witnessed what seemed to him a drunken squabble, or a bit of horse-play, two or three hundred yards off. He saw one man knocked or pushed down, as he thought, and he afterwards saw another on the ground. The four men left got upon the car in waiting, and drove quickly past Lieutenant Greatorex, along the road leading to the Hibernian School. He wondered why the two men on the ground did not arise, till he walked up to where they lay, and he then found them dead. A boy named Samuel Jacob, while strolling along the sunk fence of the Viceregal grounds, also saw three or four men near a car wrestling with two other men; he saw one man hit another, with the fist, as he thought, when the latter was on the ground; this man then followed his companions, who had got upon the car, and it took them away together. Two young men riding on tricycles, Patrick William Maguire and Thomas Foley, had seen the two unfortunate gentlemen walking arm-in-arm a few minutes before. The tricyclists having reached the Phoenix Park Column, rounded it and turned back, and when they had come 200 yards on their return saw the dead bodies. Lord F. Cavendish's was lying in the carriage-way, stabbed through the right lung, with a deep wound in the neck and another in the side. His right arm was broken. Death must have been instantaneous, for there was no sign of life, and blood was oozing in large quantities from the wounds. The body of Mr. Burke was found lying on the grass. It was fearfully mutilated. The throat was cut right across the windpipe. There was a wound in the breast going through the base of the heart, and a third, about two inches long, on the left side of his neck, just under the ear.

The alarm was at once given to the police, and at the Viceregal Lodge; the military guard turned out, and a stretcher was brought. The body of Lord F. Cavendish was placed on this, till a car could be fetched, and that of Mr. Burke was put on another car. The police went to Stevens's Hospital, and Dr. Thomas Myles, the resident surgeon, at once came out, but on the way met a party carrying the body of Mr. Burke, about one hundred and fifty yards inside the Park gate. At first he thought he could feel the heart action, but afterwards believed that he was mistaken. Half a mile further on he met a party of guardsmen bringing the body of Lord F. Cavendish, who was dead. The bodies were brought to the hospital, where a further examination was made. A servant from the Viceregal Lodge identified the bodies as those of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, and they were then placed in a private room and locked up, pending the Coroner's inquest. The police remained in charge, and would allow no one to see them. After the bodies had been removed from the scene of the assassination, policemen were left near the great pools of blood which marked the scene of the crime. A crowd soon collected at the dreadful spot.

The shocking news was presently communicated by telegraph to London, and the Home Secretary at once made it known to Mr. Gladstone. There was an official reception that evening at the Admiralty, where several of the Ministers were present. Lord Hartington was informed of his brother's death by a telegram sent from Dublin to Devonshire House. He went directly, accompanied by Mrs. Gladstone, who is aunt to Lady Frederick Cavendish, to tell that unhappy lady that she had lost her husband. A message was also dispatched by Lord Hartington to his aged father, the Duke of Devonshire, who was at Chatsworth, in Derbyshire. The Ministers, hastily leaving the Admiralty, went to Downing-street to discuss the situation of affairs, and a Cabinet Council was summoned for three o'clock next day (Sunday afternoon). By eleven o'clock on Saturday evening, most London people who were about town, whether at the clubs, or at the theatres, or at evening parties, heard of the terrible event. At the Gaiety Theatre, where the Prince and Princess of Wales were among the audience, the performance was stopped. On Sunday morning, the news having spread to every large town in England, there was a movement of national feeling seldom equalled. Thousands of people first heard of it at their churches and chapels, when they assembled for Divine worship; the leading clergymen and dissenting ministers spoke of it from the pulpit. But some of the provincial newspapers came out on Sunday with special editions, which were eagerly bought up at any price; and meetings were called for the Sunday afternoon or evening by the local politicians, especially the Irishmen in Birmingham, Manchester, and Liverpool, to denounce the infamous crime at Dublin.

The leaders of the Irish Land League, Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and others, who had on Saturday afternoon welcomed Michael Davitt on his release from the Portland convict establishment, were not apprised of the murders, though in London, till breakfast time on Sunday morning. Mr. Redmond was at Manchester, and made a speech at an Irish meeting there, which passed a resolution expressing much regret and indignation. Mr. Parnell sent telegrams to the Lord Mayor of Dublin, and to the Mayors of Cork, Waterford, and Limerick, suggesting that they should immediately call meetings of their respective Corporations to pass resolutions denouncing the assassinations; and this has been done in almost every Irish city. A manifesto, signed by Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Davitt, has been placarded in Dublin, and all over Ireland, addressed to the Irish people. It expresses, in the strongest possible language, their grief and horror at the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke as a hideous stain upon the character of their country, and as the greatest calamity that could befall their cause, just when "it had been determined at the last hour that a policy of conciliation should supplement that of terrorism and national distrust. We earnestly hope," say the Land League chiefs, "that the attitude and action of the whole Irish people will assure the world that an assassination such as that which has startled us almost to the abandonment of hope for our country's cause is deeply and religiously abhorrent to their every feeling and instinct. We appeal to you to show, by every manner of expression possible, that amidst the universal feeling of horror which this assassination has excited, no people feel so intense a detestation of its atrocity, or so deep a sympathy for those whose hearts must be seared by it, as the nation upon whose prospects and reviving hopes it may entail consequences more ruinous than have yet fallen to the lot of unhappy Ireland during the present generation." These sentiments are repeated, with some additional remarks, in the statements which the Land League Members of Parliament have made to the reporters of the Press Association; and Michael Davitt says, "I deeply grieve to think that just at the time when the Government had run a risk in introducing a new policy, when everything appeared to be bright and hopeful, when the expectations seemed to be universal that all outrage would cease in Ireland in response to the changed attitude of the Government, this terrible event should occur, and dash our hopes to the ground. After what has now occurred, I wish to God I had never left Portland. Where was the motive for the crime? Its commission is not only the most fatal blow which has ever been struck at the Land League, but one of the most disastrous blows that have been sustained during the last century by the national cause in Ireland."

An inquest on the bodies of the two murdered gentlemen was opened by the Coroner for the City of Dublin, Dr. N. Whyte, at Steevens's Hospital, on Sunday morning, and was adjourned to Monday, when the Attorney-General for Ireland, Mr. W. M. Johnson, M.P. for Mallow, was present on behalf of the Crown. The witnesses examined were Mr. Steel, superintendent of messengers at Dublin Castle, who last saw Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke there before they went out; the car-driver, Nicholas Brubazon, who drove Mr. Burke as far as the Viceregal Lodge; Mr. P. W. Maguire and Mr. T. Foley, the young men who were riding on tricycles; and the boy, Samuel Jacob, who also saw the men struggling with each other. Lieutenant Greator also gave evidence. Dr. Myles, of Steevens's Hospital, and Mr. Porter, surgeon to the Queen in Ireland, described the state of the corpses, having made a post-mortem examination, assisted by other surgeons and physicians. On the body of Mr. Burke they discovered several wounds. There was a deep and long wound on the front and side of his neck, and another on his left breast. There was a punctured wound over the second rib on the left side, and another on the breast bone, and there were also wounds on the left hand. They found a deep wound in the back of the interior angle of the shoulder-blade, and another at the side and back of the neck, penetrating to the spine. On opening the chest they found that the wound in the front of the neck, though deep, did not sever any large vessels. The wound over the second rib injured the apex of the left lung. The surgeons found what they believed was the fatal wound, that over the left shoulder-blade, which had penetrated the pericardium and entered the heart. Death from syncope must have followed almost immediately upon its infliction. It is believed that the deceased was attacked simultaneously in front and rear. The wounds on the hand point to the fact that Mr. Burke tried to defend himself against his assailants. The wounds were probably produced by a dagger or long sharp knives. The surgeons next examined the wounds of Lord Frederick Cavendish, whose clothing was cut in several places. There was a deep transverse cut on the middle of his left forearm, passing through the muscles and penetrating one of the bones; a slight portion of the bone was sliced off as though a very sharp and highly tempered weapon had been employed. They found a deep wound in the left arm-pit, and an abrasion on the right cheek. There was a wound on the right side of the root of the neck, just above the collar-bone, and another over the cartilage of the second rib on the right side. On the back there was a deep angular wound over the right shoulder, penetrating to the bone. The backbone was injured. There was a further wound over the back of the neck, injuring the sixth or vital vertebra. It was found on opening the body that the wound in the shoulder was the fatal wound, and that it had severed two large arteries. The instrument with which the wounds were inflicted would probably be an instrument with a double edge. It must have been a very long instrument and strong in the middle, and probably from nine to twelve inches long. A bowie knife or a sword bayonet might have caused the wounds.

The Coroner's Jury, on Monday, returned a verdict that Lord Frederick Charles Cavendish and Mr. Thomas Henry Burke were wilfully murdered by persons unknown. The Jury also expressed their abhorrence of the crime which had disgraced the country, and their sympathy with the families of the deceased; and approved of the movement to start a public subscription for a reward for the discovery of the guilty parties.

The removal of the dead bodies from Steevens's Hospital is the subject of one of our illustrations. They were placed in temporary coffins and borne to the front of the hospital, where two covered biers were drawn up. In these the coffins were placed, and, followed by an escort of mounted police, the sad procession moved at a rapid pace towards the Chief Secretary's Lodge. The route taken was not the usual direction through the Park, which was thronged with people anxious to see the spot where the murder took place, but by a road outside the Park wall, through the Island Bridge Gate, and thence by the Phoenix statue. At several points along the way small knots of spectators had gathered, but not a single head was uncovered as the cortege passed. Doubtless this was owing to the deep awe which must have fallen upon everyone; but no one accustomed to the demeanour of an Irish crowd in presence of the dead could fail to be struck by the circumstance. Half a dozen police were in charge of the gate, and along the boundary separating the Chief Secretary's grounds from the rest of the park some men of the D Division were stationed at intervals. The Lodge had a gloomy and deserted appearance, the blinds being closely drawn, and the few servants in the household moving about with noiseless footsteps and saddened faces. Almost at the moment that the bodies were carried inside, a heavy thunderstorm burst with sudden fury overhead, and for nearly half an hour the warring elements were in keeping with the terror that possessed the minds of men upon whom a full appreciation of the horror of the situation had fallen. The remains were laid in one of the drawing-rooms, the windows of which look out upon the Dublin mountains.

On Monday evening, between five and six o'clock, the body of Lord Frederick Cavendish was removed from the Viceregal Lodge, Dublin, to the North Wall Wharf, on a gun-carriage, and put on board the steam-boat for England. The body was inclosed in a leaden coffin, the outer mahogany shell being panelled with rich black silk velvet. The breast-plate bore the following inscription:—"Lord Frederick Charles Cavendish, second son of the Duke of Devonshire; born Nov. 30, 1836; died May 6, 1882." A detachment of dragoons formed an escort, and all along the route to the boat the sad procession was received with marks of the utmost sympathy by the immense crowds that had gathered to pay a mark of respect to the deceased. The coffin was placed in a box on the deck, and was covered with the Union Jack. The steamer started almost immediately, and the saddened assemblage slowly dispersed. The funeral of Lord F. Cavendish took place on Thursday afternoon in Edensor Churchyard, which is about a mile from Chatsworth House, in what is known as the Duke's burial-ground. A special train from London conveyed several of her Majesty's Ministers, and other members of both Houses of Parliament, to Chatsworth to attend the funeral. The House of Commons did not sit until nine o'clock in the evening, in order that they might have time to return to London.

The funeral of Mr. Thomas Burke took place on Tuesday, in the Glasnevin Cemetery, Dublin, and was attended by a representative of the Lord Lieutenant, the Judges, barristers, merchants, and others, the shops being closed along the route of the procession. The members of the Dublin Corn Exchange, the Chamber of Commerce, the Council of the Home-Rule League, and other public bodies and organisations in Dublin, and throughout Ireland, met and passed resolutions denouncing the assassinations, and expressing sympathy with the bereaved friends.

The Government have offered a reward of £10,000 for the apprehension of the murderers. A sum of £2000 has been subscribed in Cork for the same object, and the Corporations of Dublin, Cork, and other cities have voted money to that purpose. Numerous arrests have been made in Ireland, but in nearly every case the persons detained have been liberated after giving satisfactory accounts of themselves to the police. There was a parade of all the cars bearing the description given of that on which the assassins were seen to drive away; but the witnesses could not identify the car required. The Liffey was dragged, in the hope of finding the weapons or other articles thrown away by the assassins in escaping. Still, the clues in the hands of the police are being followed up. Additional evidence, too, is continually cropping up. Two brass-fitters, named Magle and Fry, in the employment of the Southern Railway at Inchicore, have informed the police that they passed the scene of the assassination on bicycles just as the murder was being committed. They saw two men attack the Chief Secretary and Under-Secretary. There were two other men near. Lord Frederick Cavendish was out on the roadway at the time, moving away from his assailant, who made a plunge with what appeared to be a butcher's knife at him. His arm was raised, and his Lordship fell on the road, almost striking the bicycle of one of them. Both heard Lord F. Cavendish before falling exclaim to his assailant, "Ah! you villain!" The other men at this time were attacking Mr. Burke. Magle and Fry, on their bicycles, got away as fast as they could as one of the murderers advanced towards them with a bloody knife. One of these witnesses fainted when he got down some distance. They noticed the car at the side of the road adjacent to where the murders were perpetrated. The driver had his back to the murderers. Two gardeners state that, as they were coming into Dublin on Saturday evening, they noticed a hackney car on the road near the Phoenix, the driver alone being on it, but there were four men lounging under the trees. When the gardeners reached the Gough Statue, they met the Chief Secretary and Under-Secretary walking up.

The police are convinced that the car with the men left the city for the Phoenix Park about five on Saturday evening. It passed along by the side of the park, which it entered by the Island Bridge gate, and then, crossing the sward between the Civil Service and Garrison cricket grounds, reached the main road. The murderers then drove up to near the Phoenix Monument, and awaited their victims. They got off the car, which remained on the roadway, and concealed themselves under a clump of trees till they saw Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke approach. Then they suddenly made a rush upon them. Afterwards they drove away, through the village of Chapelizod, at such a furious pace that a carman who was washing his car there was nearly knocked down by the vehicle. He remonstrated with the occupants, who were quite close to him. He has given a very minute description of the men, of the car, and of the horse. He states that he would have no difficulty in identifying any of them. The car crossed the Chapelizod Bridge, and turned back towards Inchicore, where it came into collision with a bread cart, the driver of which has also given the police information that is considered to be most important. From Inchicore the car drove back by a much-frequented thoroughfare into the city. Attention is therefore being directed to the districts of Dublin where such men would be most likely to find a hiding-place. A party of seamen of the Belleisle, man-of-war, with appliances for dragging rivers, arrived at Dublin on Monday for the purpose of dragging the Liffey at Chapelizod and along the strawberry-beds in the hope of finding in it the weapons used by the murderers. They may have got away to America. Detective arrangements are being made to watch all incoming steamers at New York since Saturday last for persons answering the official description of the criminals, and a reward has been offered by the British Consul-General for any information about them. The Irishmen of Boston have subscribed £1000 to be paid for their apprehension.

The speeches and resolutions in the two Houses of Parliament on Monday are noticed in another column of this paper. The Prime Minister has sent out the following notification:—"Mr. Gladstone has received a flood of telegrams and communications from every part of the three kingdoms, expressive of the universal horror and indignation which are felt at the atrocious crime of Saturday evening last. Among these it is just to say that none are more remarkable for fervour and evident sincerity than the very large number which proceeds from all parts of Ireland. As separate acknowledgment of each of them has become impossible, he at once takes the liberty of requesting an early insertion of this paragraph, or its substance, in the public journals, that he may thus express, in the first instance, his sense of the genuine feeling and just aim of these communications; and, in the next, his personal thanks for the abundant assurances of sympathy with himself and his family which they contain.—10, Downing-street, May 9, 1882."

The vacant offices in the Irish Government have been filled up by the appointment of Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, M.P., to be Chief Secretary; and Mr. R. G. C. Hamilton to be Permanent Under-Secretary for Ireland.

Our Obituary this week contains brief memoirs of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. T. H. Burke, whose portraits we have engraved for present publication; that of the former being copied from a photograph by the London Stereoscopic Company, and the latter from one by Mr. Chancellor, of Lower Sackville-street, Dublin.

THE LATE BISHOP OF SYDNEY.

The Most Rev. Frederic Barker, Bishop of Sydney, and Metropolitan of Australia, whose death took place on the 6th ult., was born in 1808, at Baslow, in Derbyshire, where his father was Vicar for a period of thirty years. At an early age he was sent to Grantham School, and from there went to Jesus College, Cambridge, where he graduated. In 1829 he took his B.A., and was ordained in 1831. His first work was in the village of Upton, Cheshire, where he remained for three years, and afterwards spent one year on the Irish Mission. He next took charge of the parish of St. Mary, Edge-hill, Liverpool, where for nineteen years he performed important work with much zeal and ability. When the bishopric of Sydney, Australia, became vacant, he was nominated to the see and was consecrated on Nov. 30, 1854, at Lambeth. The work in the Southern Hemisphere was of a heavy and arduous character. His diocese was about a thousand miles in extent, and the organisation was somewhat inefficient. One of his greatest works was the formation of a general synod capable of exercising authority to a limited extent over the whole Church in Australia and Tasmania. It consists of clerical and lay representatives of the several local diocesan synods. The formation of the general synod may be regarded as having perfected the constitution of the Church in that part of the world. The first meeting was a memorable one, and took place on Dec. 5, 1866. In the first seven years of his work in Australia he consecrated eighty-eight churches and school-churches; and then followed the raising of a sum of £44,000 for a church fund; the establishment of a theological college in Liverpool, N.S.W., where in one year ten students were ordained; and the establishment of a clergy-daughters' school in Sydney, built at a cost of £3500, in which large numbers of clergymen's children are highly educated at a small charge; and, lastly, the erection of a magnificent metropolitan cathedral, St. Andrew's, also in Sydney, which was opened in 1868. After twenty-seven years' presidency over the Australian churches, Bishop Barker had been advised in consequence of a paralytic seizure to return to Europe, and after a few weeks' illness he passed peacefully away, on April 6, at San Remo, in Italy. His body was brought to England, and he was buried in the churchyard of his native village at Baslow, near Chatsworth, Derbyshire, on April 18. Bishop Perry, a former colleague, and a number of other clergymen conducted the mournful service. Bishop Barker was twice married, first, to Sophia Jane, daughter of the late John Harden, Esq., of Field House, Lancashire, who died in Sydney in 1876; and secondly, in 1878, to Mary, daughter of Mr. Edward Woods, engineer, of London.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, May 9. The assassination of Lord Cavendish and of Mr. Burke has naturally formed the leading topic of serious conversation here during the past two days. The Conservative and the Republican journals are unanimous in condemning and regretting the act. The Radical press sides with the assassins. The Citizen says, Bravo! The Intransigent comprises in the same admiration the assassins of Phoenix Park and the Russian Nihilists. In both cases, it says, the victims employ the knife, the revolver, or the bombshell, because their oppressors have really left them no other means of discussion.

There was a singularly brilliant attendance in the tribunes of the Chamber of Deputies yesterday. The ladies were attracted in force by the discussion of the bill for the re-establishment of divorce. The debate was very ordinary. The bill, however, was voted, on the first reading, by 334 votes against 124. M. de Marcère, who pleaded in favour of the bill, quoted a remark of M. Augier, who said to him one day: "You are right in demanding divorce; it is necessary for the re-establishment of order in families; but you will deal a terrible blow to the dramatic authors." Hitherto the principal subject of modern French plays, and of novels too, has been adultery and its consequences in the conjugal and family relations. But the moment divorce exists adultery will cease to be interesting, and not a few of the plays of Dumas and Sardou, and of the novels of Belot, Malot, Zola, and the rest will take their place in the dust of oblivion along with the once-famous lucubrations of Madeleine de Scudéry. But the dramatic authors have still a gleam of hope: the bill will undoubtedly be voted by the Chamber on the second reading; the vote of the Senate is not so sure.

General Türr is trying to gain celebrity as the promoter of the Isthmus of Corinth Canal. M. de Lesseps, in order not to be left in the shade, is beginning to talk about the creation of an inland sea in Africa, the idea of which is due to Captain Roudaire, of the staff. Captain Roudaire has been studying the question since 1875, and, thanks to the influence of M. de Lesseps, he has had the support of the French Government and the approbation of the Academy of Sciences. The plans elaborated by Captain Roudaire consist of a canal of 200 kilometres, from Gabès in Tunis to the Chott Rhassa on the frontier of the Regency and of Algeria. Then from the Chott Rhassa to the Chott Melzir, in the province of Constantine, a second canal of 40 kilometres would be dug. The sea would thus run more than 320 kilometres, some 200 miles, inland, forming in the Chott Rhassa a basin three times as big as the Lake of Geneva, and in the Chott Melzir a basin fourteen times as big as the Lake of Geneva. To cut these canals, M. de Lesseps estimates that six years work and 75 millions of francs would be sufficient. Besides the commercial advantages, the creation of this inland sea would have the strategic advantage of preserving Algeria from invasions from the East.

At a meeting of the "Société Libre des Artistes Français" yesterday, a member called attention to the growing invasion of the Salon by foreigners. I have, indeed, counted in the department of oil-painting alone at the present Salon some thirty English exhibitors and no less than seventy Americans. Nevertheless, if the Society determines to exclude the foreigners, it will deprive the Salon of a powerful element of interest. This year the Anglo-American contingent has provided about one half of the really striking pictures of the exhibition.

The French play at London has become an affair of such importance that the Parisian theatres have to change their programmes perforce because their "stars" desert them. The company that M. Mayer has formed this year is exceptionally brilliant. Indeed, no French theatre could unite at the same time so much talent. The "stars" are Mesdames Sarah Bernhardt (Damala), Reichenberg, Barretta, Bartet, Tholer; MM. Coquelin, Mounet-Sully, Febvre, Worms, Thiron, Coquelin cadet, Talbot, Mesdames Céline Chautmont and Fromentin, M. Daubray, of the Palais-Royal, and Dieudonné. The secondary rôles will be filled by MM. Martel, Boucher, Garrud, Sylvain, Prudhon, Roger, and Mesdames Amel, Fayole, Martin, Fremaux, all of the Comédie-Française, together with twenty-six other ladies and gentlemen, chosen from the companies of the Odéon, Gymnase, Vaudeville, and Palais-Royal Theatres. The novelties of this ninth season at the Gaiety include Erckmann-Chatrian's new play, "Les Rantzau," and the famous "Divorçons!," soon destined to lose its piquancy if M. Naquet's bill is made law. Under the auspices of Sir John Cowell, Master of the Royal Household, some experiments with various systems of electric lighting have been made at Windsor Castle.

A meeting of managers of Board Schools in London was held last Saturday, in the Lecture-Room of the Society of Arts, to consider the present relations between the managers and the School Board. Sir E. H. Currie occupied the chair, and about 150 managers were present. The Rev. Canon Money moved a resolution affirming the necessity for a revision of the present relations between the managers and the board, and a long discussion ensued, in which most of the speakers complained that they were intrusted with practically no power whatever. The resolution was carried, as was also another appointing a committee to draw up a memorial to be submitted to a future meeting.

THE LATE LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH, M.P., CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND, MURDERED ON SATURDAY LAST.

RESIDENCE OF THE CHIEF SECRETARY IN PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO EPPING FOREST: HER MAJESTY RECEIVING THE ADDRESS OF THE CORPORATION.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO EPPING FOREST.

The ancient Royal Chase or hunting ground of Epping, with its sylvan scenes and pleasant greenwood recesses for the holiday enjoyment of Londoners, being henceforth legally preserved and freely dedicated to public use, was visited last Saturday afternoon by her Majesty the Queen, and by the Duke of Connaught, Ranger of the Forest, meeting there the Lord Mayor and City Corporation, to declare this final confirmation of a great boon to the people. We gave, in the Extra Supplement to last week's publication, a series of Sketches of the scenery of Epping Forest and its neighbourhood, with some account of the proceedings that have been taken, during several years past, to defend the public rights against the encroachments of private unauthorised ownership, and to procure the best security for what remains of a grand domain of the Crown, which has been freely devoted to popular recreation.

The weather on Saturday afternoon was bright and warm; and many thousands of people went out to Epping Forest by the two lines of railway—one to Chingford, on the western side, the other line to Loughton, beyond Woodford and Buckhurst-hill, eastward of High Beech, the place where the ceremony was to be performed. Both lines are in the suburban system of the Great Eastern Railway Company. The day was, to a great extent, observed as a general holiday in the East of London. The Queen, with Princess Beatrice, attended by the Dowager Duchess of Athole, Sir H. Ponsonby, and General Lynedoch Gardiner, travelled from Windsor by special train, on the Great Western Railway, changing at Acton to the Kew and Hampstead Junction line, and so on to the North London Railway, and thence at Victoria Park to the Chingford line. On arriving at Chingford, about four o'clock, the Queen was met by Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. Her Majesty was there formally received by the Lord Mayor (Mr. Whittaker Ellis), Mr. H. J. Rebow (High Sheriff of Essex), Mr. Alderman Hanson and Mr. Anderson Ogg (Sheriffs of London), Mr. Deputy Hora (the Chairman of the Committee), and Sir Thomas Nelson (the acting Remembrancer). The Forest Sub-Reception Committee were also awaiting her Majesty's arrival.

A procession was then formed, which left Chingford station amid the booming of a Royal salute, the playing of the National Anthem by the bands of the Royal Artillery and the 3rd Middlesex Artillery, and the cheering of the people. Opposite the Royal Forest Hotel, the balconies of which were filled with spectators, the scene was very animated, and flags and banners streamed and hats and handkerchiefs waved on every side. At the junction of the roads a little farther on were stationed the children of the Woodford Schools, of Mrs. Gladstone's Home, the Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum, the Loughton Schools, the Buckhurst and Chigwell Schools, and the Princess Louise's Home. All along the route to High Beech her Majesty's reception was of a highly enthusiastic character.

The procession was headed by the mounted police, the members of the Epping Forest Sub-Reception Committee, the chairman of the Epping Forest Committee, the verderers of Epping Forest, the Under-Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, the officers of the Corporation of London, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, the Aldermen of the City of London (on the committee), the Lady Mayoress, and the High Sheriff of Essex. Guards of honour of the 1st Battalion Warwickshire Regiment and of the Essex Artillery Volunteers were stationed at Chingford Station. A salute was fired in the neighbourhood of Hawk's Wood on her Majesty's arrival. The Queen, accompanied by Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), Princess Beatrice, and the Duchess of Connaught, occupied the first carriage. In the second carriage were the Dowager Duchess of Athole (Lady-in-Waiting to the Queen), Lady Adela Larking (in attendance on the Duchess of Connaught), Lady Eleanor Heneage (Lady-in-Waiting upon Princess Louise), and Lord Sandhurst (Lord-in-Waiting). The Duke of Connaught and Strathearn, K.G., Ranger of Epping Forest, rode by the side of her Majesty's carriage. The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, General the Right Hon. Sir H. Ponsonby, Lieutenant-General H. Lynedoch Gardiner, Sir Maurice FitzGerald (Knight of Kerry), and Major-General the Hon. Sir H. Clifford followed her Majesty's carriage on horseback. An escort, under the command of Captain Lord Arthur Somerset and Lieutenant Selwyn (Royal Horse Guards), was in attendance.

On her Majesty's arrival at High Beech the Royal Standard was hoisted, and her Majesty was received by a Guard of Honour of the Essex Artillery Volunteers, and a salute was fired by a battery of the Hon. Artillery Company. The H Company of the 1st Herts Volunteers was stationed on the route. The London Rifle Brigade, the 3rd Essex Rifle Volunteers, and the Leyton Volunteer Fire Brigade lined the route of the procession. Miss Victoria Buxton had the honour of presenting a bouquet to her Majesty. An address from the Corporation of London was read by the Recorder, welcoming her to the forest, and testifying to the deep interest which the Sovereign had taken in the movement which resulted in that day's ceremonial. Her Majesty, in reply, said:—"I thank you sincerely for your loyal and dutiful address, and it gives me the greatest satisfaction to dedicate this beautiful forest for the enjoyment of my people. I thank you for your continued solicitude for my welfare." The Lord Mayor then, in her Majesty's name, "declared this beautiful forest open and dedicated to the delectation of the public for all time," an announcement which was received with loud cheering, the bands playing the National Anthem, and the Artillery firing a Royal salute.

The Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, Mr. Deputy Hora, the mover, and Mr. Wheeler, the seconder of the address, were then presented to the Queen by the Lord Mayor. The Lord Lieutenant of Essex, the High Sheriff of Essex, Mr. John Thomas Bedford, and Sir Thomas Nelson (the City Solicitor) were also presented to her Majesty. The Queen then went to a part of the forest, where a fine specimen of the scarlet oak (Quercus coccinea) was planted in her Majesty's name, under the direction of Messrs. William Paul and Son, of Waltham Cross. Before the Royal procession returned to Chingford, the Lady Mayoress had the honour of presenting to the Queen a volume of photographs of the most interesting scenery of the forest. Lord Carlisle, Lord Lieutenant of Essex, received the Queen at the station. The Earl and Countess Granville, Sir William Harcourt, Home Secretary, Sir Richard Cross, and other persons of note were among the company. Her Majesty left Chingford at half-past five, and arrived at Windsor shortly before seven o'clock, amid the same tokens of loyal affection as on the outward journey. For thousands of people who remained in the forest there was provided at dusk a grand display of fireworks by Messrs. C. T. Brock and Co., at the rear of the Royal Forest Hotel, the grounds of which were also illuminated.

Mr. Richard Wallis, formerly a commission broker, of Tower-street, who died recently at Hackney-wick, at the advanced age of ninety years, has bequeathed £1000 to the Victoria Park (Congregational) Tabernacle.

MUSIC.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

WAGNER'S NIBELUNGEN OPERA-DRAMAS.

The first performances in England of these works (to which we have previously drawn attention) began yesterday (Friday) week, and concluded last Tuesday night. The series consists of four divisions, the dramatic interest of which is continuous, that of the music being rendered so, to some extent, by the incorporation, in each evening's portion, of marking themes ("leitmotiven") associated with some of the principal characters. The Nibelungen "opera-dramas" were originally produced at Bayreuth (in a theatre specially built for them), under the composer's superintendence, in August, 1876, their most recent repetition, until now, having been at Berlin last year. Like Wagner's other stage works, the books were written by himself, and present even more partiality for romantic and extravagant incidents, and tragic passion of an extreme kind. In his treatment of the German mediæval legend he has shown occasional feeling for dramatic effect, with some touches of poetic sentiment; together with many instances of melodramatic exaggeration, and a general tendency towards horrors of a grotesque and monstrous kind, such as are scarcely fitted for stage representation, and are altogether unsuitable for musical illustration.

The leading dramatic features of the work have before been fully detailed, and may now, therefore, be more slightly sketched in their entirety, as we have to refer to all four performances in this notice. The plot of the whole is based on the ancient German legend of the treasure of gold, guarded by the Rhine daughters in the depths of the river, and the evil consequences attending its abstraction by the Nibelung dwarf Alberich, and the subsequent contests for its possession by gods of the Walhalla and giants and dwarfs on the earth. The treasure gives unlimited power to its possessor, but he must be one who has foresworn love. This condition is fulfilled by Alberich the Nibelung, who forms a ring out of the abstracted gold. Wotan, chief of the Walhalla, coveting the treasure, descends to the Nibelung, and by stratagem obtains it. A curse has been attached to the ring, the result of which is that the giants—who have carried off the goddess Freia, and claim the ring and gold as ransom for her return—are victims of the curse, their quarrel ending in the death of one of them. "Das Rheingold" closes with the lamentation of the Rhine maidens at the loss of the treasure. The performance was excellent in every respect, Madame Hedwig Reicher-Kindermann as Fricka, Herr Vogl as Loge, Herr Schelper as Alberich, Herr Schlosser as Mime, particularly distinguished themselves by their fine acting and excellent declamation, the cast having been efficiently completed by Fraulein Schreiber, Riegler, Krauss, Klafsky, and Schulze, and Herren Scaria, Wiegand, Bürgin, Eilers, and Biberti.

In Die Walküre we are introduced to the nine maidens (Walkyries) who have to convey the noblest warriors slain in battle to the castle of the Walhalla. The giant Fafner is in possession of the ring (guarding it in the shape of a gigantic worm), the recovery of which is sought by Wotan. He has a son, Siegmund, and a daughter, Sieglinde (mortals), for the former of whom the wondrous sword "Nothung" is destined. These young people, who have long been separated, suddenly meet in the cottage of Siegmund's husband, Hunding. Siegmund and Sieglinde fly together, the former being destined to fall by the hand of the aggrieved Hunding. Brünnhilde, the principal Walkyrie, protects Siegmund in his fight with Hunding; but the interposition of Wotan's spear shivers the sword "Nothung" of Siegmund, who falls mortally wounded by Hunding, he being killed by Wotan, and Brünnhilde riding off with the lady. Wotan condemns the Walkyrie to sleep on the rock, until awoken by a man who shall claim her as wife, it being certain that no coward can do so, as she is to be surrounded by a circle of fire. Here again the acting and declamation were of more interest than the music, as music—a specialty having been the admirable performance of Herr Albert Niemann as Siegmund. Excellent also were those of Frauen Saches-Hofmeister, Vogl, and Reicher-Kindermann as Sieglinde, Brünnhilde, and Fricka, and Herr Scaria as Wotan; the cast having been completed by Herr Wiegand as Hunding, and efficient representatives of the eight Walkyries.

The next division of the Trilogy, "Siegfried," deals with the adventures of that hero, the son of Siegmund, who is now dead. Mime, Alberich's brother, and forger of the tarn-helm of invisibility, brings up the boy Siegfried to be the winner of the Rhine treasure for the use of the former, who, with the mended sword, "Nothung," seeks an encounter with the worm (the transformed Fafner) and slays him; a quarrel respecting the booty leading to the death of Mime at the hands of Siegfried. The hero, learning the destiny of Brünnhilde, seeks her rescue, and plunges through the flames. Siegfried contemplates the beauty of the ci-devant Walkyrie with rapture, and mutual love ensues. Here also fine acting and declamation gave full effect to the various situations; the performances of Frau Vogl as Brünnhilde and Herr Vogl as Siegfried having been specially excellent. Very good also was Herr Scaria in the long declamations of the Wanderer (Wotan), and Fraulein Schreiber in the music of the Wood-bird; the other principal characters having also been well represented by Frau Riegler (Erda) and Herren Schlosser and Schelper (Mime and Alberich).

The closing division of the work, "Götterdämmerung" ("Twilight of the Gods"), opens with Brünnhilde on the rock; the three Norns (or Fates) discoursing of the events which are leading to the downfall of the gods. Siegfried bestows on Brünnhilde the fated ring, the cause of so many dire events. We are next taken to the Gibichung's Hall on the Rhine, with the King, his sister Gutrune, and Hagen (his half-brother) seated at table. The last-named personage has been trained by Alberich to recover possession of the ring; in order to which, he endeavours to promote in Gunther a passion for Brünnhilde, and in Gutrune for Siegfried, unknowing of the latter's relations with Brünnhilde. To ensure this result, a charmed draught is administered to Siegfried by Gutrune, with whom he immediately falls in love. A change takes place to the rocky abode of Brünnhilde, who is solicited by Waltraute (one of the Walkyries) to restore the ring to the Rhine daughters, and thus prevent the evil consequences to which it is destined to lead. Brünnhilde refuses to part with the gift of Siegfried, who arrives in the semblance of Gunther (by aid of the tarn-helm). He takes the ring from her forcibly, and leads her to the King. She recognises the ring on the hand of Siegfried, who has resumed his own shape, and her love turns to bitter vengeance; and she accordingly denounces him. Mutual distrust and consternation ensue, and the hero is doomed to death, Brünnhilde having communicated to Hagen the secret of the only spot where Siegfried is accessible to sword or spear thrust—the bridal procession of Siegfried and Gutrune closing the scene. This is followed by a recurrence to the shore of the river, and the gambols of the Rhine daughters, Siegfried entering and being solicited by them to give back the ring, which he for some time refuses, but is on the point of yielding when they denounce a curse on him. The Royal hunting party enters, and Siegfried narrates his past adventure with the monster; and, under the spell of drink handed to him by Hagen, he recounts the truth of his association with Brünnhilde. The King and all are horror-stricken, and Hagen takes vengeance by spearing Siegfried, who dies protesting his love for Brünnhilde. The scene recurs to the Gibichung's Hall. Gutrune bewails the death of Siegfried, and Hagen attempts to take possession of the ring, but is opposed by Gunther, who is slain in the contest, the hand of the corpse of Siegfried having been miraculously waived in menace. Brünnhilde takes the ring from Siegfried's finger, directs the preparation of a funeral pile for her lost lover, and resolves to sacrifice herself on it, thus also destroying the curse of the ill-omened ring. She plunges into the fire, the river rises and approaches, bearing the Rhine daughters; Hagen endeavours to rescue the ring from the waters, but is dragged beneath them by two of the nymphs, the other holding up the recovered treasure. The sky is illuminated by the flames of the burning Walhalla; the gods are doomed; as are other conflicting activities, except that of love, which triumphs. The action and declamation of the performers were again powerful aids to the general effect; the Brünnhilde of Frau Vogl and the Siegfried of Herr Vogl having been prominent. The Gutrune of Fraulein Schreiber, the Waltraute of Frau Reicher-Kindermann, the Hagen of Herr Schelper, the Gunther of Herr Wiegand, and the Alberich of Herr Biberti, were all more or less important features in the cast, which included the same representatives of the three Rhine daughters as before, and Fraulein Riegler, Milar, and Liebmann as the three Norns.

The incidents above summarised are, as already said, generally extravagant, frequently grotesque, and unsuited for musical purposes, more especially for vocal associations; and it can scarcely be denied that, together with some dramatic effects (chiefly of the monstrous and horrible kind), Wagner's opera books are not such as any of the great composers of the past would have chosen to work on. The occasional instances of poetical feeling are alternated with examples of colloquial commonplace and stilted affectation; and his use of alliterative verse is carried to an excess that is sometimes the reverse of attractive.

In summarising the musical effects of the four evenings it is impossible not to recognise the presence of some powerful dramatic writing; with the frequent prevalence of long and wearisome declamation, devoid of musical thought or form, and, in its way, as uninteresting as the conventionalism of old-fashioned Italian opera recitative. It cannot be disguised that if Wagner's principles of operatic composition were to supersede all others, the art of vocalisation, the charm of cultivated solo singing, would be completely lost. To Wagner this would matter little or nothing, as his chief impressions are produced by his orchestral effects. In the use of these combinations and varieties (of which he is certainly a thorough master) Wagner is greatly indebted to Berlioz, whose scores he has evidently studied with emulative care.

The music of all four divisions presents so much general resemblance, in the prevalence of formless declamation, that there is little occasion for detailed criticism. Among the most effective portions were the orchestral prelude to "Das Rheingold," some of the music of the Rhine daughters, that of the Nibelungen regions, and that of the Walhalla scene. In "Die Walküre," the celebrated "Ride of the Valyries" was notable, as were Siegmund's Song of the Sword, and passages in the love-duet for him and Sieglinde. In "Siegfried," the sword-forging scene contains much that is characteristic, still more pleasing being the music for the woodbird and its associated passages. The final love-duet between Siegfried and Brünnhilde contains, amid much wearisome declamation, some passages of great dramatic power, and others of tender sentiment. It was finely sung by both artists. In "Götterdämmerung" the several scenes between Siegfried and Brünnhilde include much passionate writing, as does that of the catastrophe in the final act. The death of Siegfried and the solemn orchestral music following it were very impressive, as was the lament of Brünnhilde over the body of her lover, and her impassioned expressions of despair when resolving to sacrifice herself; the recurring music of the Rhine daughters, near the close of the act, giving an agreeable relief. Very little use of the chorus is, strange to say, made by Wagner; and that little only in the last portion of the series.

The performances were conducted by Herr Anton Seidl (of the Leipzig Theatre), whose previous direction of Wagner's works in Germany has earned the warm commendations of the composer. The representations of the cycle of "Nibelungen" opera-dramas were announced to take place, for the second time, yesterday (Friday) evening, the following night, and on Monday and Tuesday evenings.

Considering the acrimonious discussion and dissension that have long prevailed as to the merit and value of Wagner's dramatic music, the performances now in course of repetition should meet with the success deserved by an enterprise that places it within the reach of an English public to decide for themselves a question that has long been a vexed one. At all events, the composer will no longer be able to say that his music has been insufficiently appreciated here from having only been heard in Italian and English translations. The occasion is one of rare interest, and, however open to critical objections from a musical point of view, the works are remarkable productions; and their admirable representation should prove highly attractive even to those who object to the music, to which the composer has set his own text. If the dramatis personæ are throughout treated almost entirely as actors and actresses rather than singers, all must admit that much of the orchestral colouring is highly picturesque and significant.

Much aid is afforded to visitors, who require such help, by the issue of a "Guide through the Music of R. Wagner's 'The Ring of the Nibelung'," published by Messrs. Schulz-Curtius, the active agents for the performances at Her Majesty's Theatre. This little book—translated into English by E. von Wolzogen from the German of H. von Wolzogen—gives an outline of the framework of the four "opera-dramas," and quotations in music-type of leading passages of the music. Mr. J. P. Jackson's "Illustrated Handbook" to "The Ring of the Nibelung" will also be found very valuable to intending visitors. It is based on letters written by the author descriptive of the original performances of the works at Bayreuth, and contains an interesting account of the legend, analyses of the action of the dramas, and quotations in music-type of leading passages of the music. Mr. Jackson, it will be remembered, translated the text of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," "Rienzi," "Tannhäuser," and "Lohengrin" for the performances in English by the Carl Rosa Opera Company. Another useful book is that published by Messrs. Schott, of Regent-street, in which the original German text is given on one side, and an English translation by H. and F. Corder on the other side.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

We can now only briefly record the proceedings at this establishment. On Thursday week, Mdle. Stahl made a very successful first appearance as Amneris in "Aida," the character of the heroine having, as heretofore, been finely rendered by Madame Fursch-Madi. Signor Frapolli as Radames, and Signor Pandolfini as Amonasro were highly efficient, as were the representatives of subordinate parts. Signor Bevignani conducted.

On Saturday "Faust" was given, with the fine performance of Madame Albani as Margherita, and a cast otherwise also as before. M. Dupont conducted.

The first of a new series of Richter concerts took place on Wednesday week, when specially fine performances were given of Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" and overture to "Tannhauser," Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz," and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. Mr. E. D'Albert played Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto (in D minor) with great effect. Herr Richter was cordially greeted on his reappearance at St. James's Hall. The second concert took place last Monday evening, when a new violin concerto, by the Russian composer Tschaiakowsky, was played by Gopodin Adolf Brodsky with great success. The work is a very characteristic one, of which we shall have occasion to speak further. Herr Betz, of the Berlin Opera, sang with much effect; and orchestral pieces were finely performed.

M. Ganz's second orchestral concert of the season took place on Saturday afternoon, when Miss A. B. Huntington made a very successful début as a vocalist; Herr Loewenberg played Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, and accompanied solos with much effect, and well-known orchestral pieces were efficiently rendered.

Madame Sophie Menter's second Pianoforte Recital (and last of the season) took place at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) week, when the lady played, with splendid execution, a varied selection of pianoforte solos.

Mr. Charles Hallé's Recitals are this year given—under the title of "Chamber Music Concerts"—at the Grosvenor Gallery. The first performance took place on Wednesday evening, when the programme included Dvorák's pianoforte quartet and that by Schumann, solo pieces for piano, and one of Handel's violin sonatas. Mr. Hallé's coadjutors were: Madame Norman-Néruda, Herr Strauss, and Herr F. Néruda. Seven more concerts are to be given on following Wednesday evenings.

That excellent violinist Mr. Pollitzer gave his evening concert at Steinway Hall on Wednesday, with a sterling programme of vocal and instrumental music.

Miss Philp's concert—to take place next Friday evening at St. James's Hall—promises to be of unusual interest, eminent vocalists and instrumentalists being engaged.

Of the fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society we must speak next week.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

It has been my exceptional good fortune to spend, in the course of the week just expired, two very pleasant evenings at the play. I went on Monday to the Globe, to see the new and original pastoral drama, entitled "Far from the Madding Crowd," by Messrs. Thomas Hardy and Comyns Carr; and on Tuesday I proceeded to the St. James's to witness the new and original play, in three acts, written by Mr. A. W. Pinero, and called "The Squire." To me these productions were literally "new and original;" for I explained last week how absence from town prevented my witnessing the first representation of the play of Messrs. Hardy and Carr; and similar reasons prevented me from being present at the St. James's at the first performance of "The Squire." Mr. Hardy's novel of "Far from the Madding Crowd," in the Cornhill, I have never read; and my ignorance of that doubtless admirable romance was, I fancy, shared by a gentleman in a box next to mine at the Globe on Monday, who, in a very audible tone, asked the lady by his side "what the doose the Madding Crowd meant." I shall therefore, when noting the points of contact between some of the incidents in the two dramas, merely mention a Common Source from which they would appear to have been derived.

At the Globe, I found in Act the First a knot of idle, querulous, bibulous yokels drinking and smoking about the premises of an antediluvian and thirsty old maltster instead of attending to the business of Miss Bathsheba Everdene, who is described as "a farmer," but who, as she farms her own land, might be entitled to be called—there being no such word as "yeowoman"—a yeoman. The faithless chawbacons who eat up their employer's substance when they should be getting in her hay or looking after her wheattricks are sternly rebuked by Gabriel Oak, who has been a farmer on his own account; but who, owing to the prevailing agricultural depression and the introduction of machinery, has been forced to give up his holding and seek a situation as bailiff on somebody else's farm. Gabriel has been the early playmate of Bathsheba Everdene, and he is passionately in love with her; but that young lady has bestowed her heart upon a handsome profligate scamp called Frank Troy, a sergeant of a regiment of dragoons quartered in the neighbourhood. To this dissipated non-commissioned officer the imprudent girl is, indeed, secretly married. His reputation for immorality is simply shocking; and he has basely seduced and abandoned poor little Fanny Robin, Bathsheba's pet dairy-maid, who has a half-crazy ne'er-do-weel of a gipsy brother, Will Robin, who is destined to act the part of Nemesis in the story. Meanwhile Bathsheba's wheattricks catch fire; but the conflagration is suppressed through the courage and presence of mind of Gabriel Oak, who, being brought in triumph—and in his shirt sleeves, and with blackened hands and face—into the presence of Bathsheba, is by her appointed bailiff of the farm. In the Second Act there are Christmas rejoicings in the Old Hall of the farm. Gabriel Oak, the bailiff, makes humble but persistent love to Bathsheba, who contemptuously rejects him, and, at the instigation of Sergeant Troy, summarily dismisses him from her service; but Troy's amours with Fanny Robin are brought to light, after the poor girl has drowned herself in despair. Taxed with his infamous behaviour to the dead dairy-maid, the culpable light dragoon has nothing to say, and the virtuously indignant Gabriel Oak is about to take summary vengeance on the betrayer, when Bathsheba flings herself between them, and avows that Frank Troy is her husband. This ends very effectively and dramatically the Second Act. In the Third we have the setting sun, and some haymaking festivities. Sergeant Troy has unaccountably disappeared, and is supposed to have been drowned, as his clothes but not his body have been found on the sea-shore, where he went to bathe. The rascal, however, is not dead. The deposition of his wearing apparel on the shore was only a ruse—not quite an original one, for it has more than once been resorted to by fraudulent bankrupts and absconding bank managers anxious to elude the researches of the Criminal Investigation Department—and he has been lurking about for two whole years with the intent of turning up at the nick of time, to say with Tartuffe, in Molière's comedy, "La Maison m'appartient," and to claim the person and the broad acres of Bathsheba. The nick of time occurs when that ill-treated young lady finds her old girlish love for the true-hearted Gabriel returning. Frank Troy comes back, with a shabby military cloak over his uniform, to assert his marital rights; but the half-crazed gipsy, Will Robin, turns up also at the nick of time with a gun, and shoots the military miscreant dead. The selection of Will as the instrument of Troy's punishment here below is very skilful; for we are entitled to assume that the gipsy will be hanged for the murder of the Sergeant; and as that Roman's sister, Fanny, has already drowned herself, there will be nobody left to be sorry for Will.

The plot of "The Squire" must by this time be familiar to thousands of playgoers—the St. James's on Monday was crowded by a most fashionable audience: thus I am absolved from minutely describing the characters and the incidents in Mr. Pinero's play. It is sufficient for my purpose to note that Kate Verity, the heroine of "The Squire," is an orphaned girl who farms her own land; that she is secretly married to a certain Lieutenant Thorndyke; that she has a bailiff, one Gilbert Hythe, whom she has known from childhood, and who passionately loves her; that in a "situation" identical to that in "Far from the Madding Crowd," Kate Verity confesses that she is Thorndyke's wife and mother of his unborn infant; and that she has a servant-maid who is unfortunate in the possession of a worthless gipsy brother. There is also a faint suggestion of a profligate non-commissioned officer, a sergeant in Thorndyke's regiment, by the name of Morris; but this military Don Juan (who is talked about in the play but is not seen) only jilts his sweetheart, Felicity Gummion, and does not do her any harm. In both plays also there is a gang of garrulous, selfish, drunken hawbucks, full of uncouth waggeries, and jabbering an archaic argot, to listen to which might drive Mr. J. Orchard Halliwell or Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte half mad. Certain characters, then, one matrimonial complication, and a single "situation" in each play appear to be drawn from the Common Source I speak of; but as plays—and they are both exceedingly clever plays—I fail to discern any similarity between "Far from the Madding Crowd" and "The Squire." It is the same scene, but the words at either theatre are different. The delineation of the characters, their motives, their dialogue, and the dénouement itself are totally dissimilar. It would really seem as though the same theme had been given out as a kind of competitive examination paper to two skilled writers, and that each had done his very best, from his own point of view, to fill up the very meagre outline furnished to him. To be sure, the outline worked upon by Messrs. Hardy and Comyns Carr was, patently, the undoubted literary property of the first-named gentleman; whereas Mr. Pinero's idea of his "Squire" may have been revealed to him in a dream: unless indeed it sprang fully armed, like Minerva from Jove's head, out of a blackberry hedge in one of the pleasant Kentish lanes in which Mr. P. was taking his morning walk. To this clever gentleman must also undeniably be given all the credit for the invention of the character of the Rev. Paul Dorrer, the "mad parson," with so much method in his madness, so admirably played by Mr. Hare. At this advanced period of the career of this deservedly successful play it would be an act of super-erogation to enlarge on the exquisitely pathetic acting of Mrs. Kendal as Kate Verity, on the manly bearing of Mr. Kendal as Lieutenant Thorndyke, or on the vigour of low-life character-painting thrown by Mr. T. W. Robertson and Miss Ada Murray respectively into the parts of the gipsy lad Izod Haggerston, and his vengeful sister Christiana. The jabbering jockings appeared to me, at both theatres, simply intolerable. I cannot help expressing my thanks, however, to the author of "The Squire" for his introduction of the character of a drunken reporter in the shape of The Representative of the Pagley Mercury. I have the highest admiration for the enterprise and energy of the provincial press; but I was not aware that it was the custom to dispatch representatives of country newspapers to chronicle the harvest homes of obscure farmers. Perhaps the inebriated reporter in "The Squire" was only some low strolling player of the Alfred Jingle type, who had passed himself off as a member of the press, in order to obtain a skinfull of cider; or, perhaps, the introduction of the caricature is to be regarded as merely a gratuitous piece of impertinence of the part of Mr. Pinero.

The principal characters in "Far from the Madding Crowd" were excellently well represented. Mrs. Bernard-Beece as Bathsheba Everdene has achieved a veritable triumph, and has made a distinct and important step in advance in her art. She looked simply charming, and as though she had walked straight out of one of the pastoral pictures of Morland or of Romney. Taste, eloquence, passion, and the most tender sentiment marked her performance; and from first to last she retained the firmest grasp on the sympathies of her audience. She was very ably seconded by Mr. Charles Kelly, who in the earnest straightforward character of Gabriel Oak earns our respect as well as our admiration. Now, Lieutenant Thorndyke, capably as the part is played by Mr. Kendal, fails to win our esteem. He is not precisely a scamp; but he is certainly a "loose fish," and although he may have had reason to believe, when he married Kate Verity, that his first wife, the foreign singing-woman, was dead, it was his bounden duty as a gentleman and a man of honour to tell Kate that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, he was a widower. Many nice girls object to widowers as husbands. They know too much. But Gabriel Oak gives his first love to Bathsheba. Sergeant Troy, at the Globe, finds a thoroughly efficient representative in Mr. J. H. Barnes. He is emphatically the "Bold Dragoon, with his Long Sword, Saddle, Bridle, O!" the handsome profligate and utterly heartless trooper, whom the lyricist must have had in his mind's eye when he wrote "The Girl I Left Behind Me." This kind of dragoon is said to have flourished at the commencement of the present century, at which period the action of "Far from the Madding Crowd" is supposed to take place. The existing dragoon, it is almost needless to observe, is a Pattern of Prudery and a Model of Morality.

The enjoyment which I derived from the performances of Monday and Tuesday last is largely enhanced by the firm persuasion that what I have written will be acceptable neither to the authors of "Far from the Madding Crowd" nor to the author of "The Squire." Bless them all! G. A. S.

The Iron and Steel Institute held their annual general meeting on Wednesday and two following days at the Institute of Civil Engineers, Westminster. The Bessemer Medal for 1882 has been presented to Mr. A. L. Holley, of New York.

The election for an Alderman for the ward of Farringdon Without, in the room of Mr. Figgins, who has resigned, terminated on Tuesday in the return of Mr. Polydore de Keyser, who polled 902 votes; Mr. Herbert J. Waterlow polled 662, and Mr. Marshall 86.

The arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool last week from the United States and Canada showed a slight increase of the former and a decrease of the latter, in comparison with the figures of the preceding week; there being a total of 1481 cattle, 2718 sheep, 4010 quarters of beef, and 1340 carcasses of mutton.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The shadow of the appalling crime in Phoenix Park fell with particular gloom over Parliament. One of the victims had by natural geniality and courtesy to all classes of men he was thrown into contact with, by steadfast hard work in a post of peculiar responsibility, and by an unfailing bonhomie not too general in official circles, won an amount of respect and regard that can be measured by the tributes paid to his noble character and great qualities now his useful career has, alas! been cruelly cut short by the hands of savage assassins in a land to the improvement of which he was about to zealously devote himself. If anything could console the relatives and friends of the late Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke in their most painful bereavement, it would be the national expression of sympathy with them called forth by the terrible murders, which Irishmen deplore as sincerely as Englishmen do.

Nothing could have been in better taste than the spontaneous tribute of respect paid by the House of Commons to the memory of Lord Frederick Cavendish on Monday. It was clear popular interest on this sad occasion was centred in the Lower House. Not only did members assemble in unusually large numbers at prayers, not alone in order to secure seats it may be safely said with regard to this afternoon; but the gallery devoted to peers and distinguished strangers, and the Ladies' Gallery, were completely filled at an exceptionally early hour. Mourning was noticeable in the prevalence of black. When Mr. Gladstone (after a brief conversation with Mr. Chamberlain behind the Speaker's Chair) took his seat between Lord Richard Grosvenor and the Home Secretary near the centre of the Treasury bench, a sudden hush fell upon the House. The attention of the vast muster of members, of the strangers in the thronged galleries, and of the Ambassadors and noble Lords, prominent among whom was the Duke of Teck, was concentrated upon the Prime Minister, who sat amidst his saddened colleagues pressing his hand to his brow till called upon by the Speaker. His right-hand man, the Marquis of Hartington, was away at Chatsworth, preparing for his lamented brother's funeral. But there were present on the front bench, in addition to the Ministers already mentioned, Mr. Childers, Mr. Bright, Mr. Hibbert, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, and Sir Henry James, facing whom, on the front Opposition bench, were Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Richard Cross, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Gibson, and other leading members of the Opposition, to the left of whom were grouped Mr. Parnell and his associates, all in deep mourning. Mr. Forster and Mr. Goschen were recognised seated next each other at the corner of the second bench behind Ministers.

Mr. Gladstone broke a silence that was felt in rising to ask the House to immediately adjourn. His face an ashen-white, the Prime Minister strenuously endeavoured to repress his grief, and by a supreme effort managed to give tremendous expression to the heartfelt sorrow of himself and colleagues. Characterising the "blackness of the crime" as unparalleled in itself, and unparalleled "for the horror which it has excited in the entire people of the United Kingdom," Mr. Gladstone in less broken tones said that in "the death of Mr. Burke we are robbed of one of the ablest, most upright, most experienced, and most eminent members of the Civil Service," and with touching earnestness lifted his voice to add, in reference to the loss of Lord Frederick Cavendish, that "one of the very noblest hearts in England has ceased to beat, and has ceased at a moment when it was just devoted to the service of Ireland, full of love for that country, full of hope for the future, full of capacity to render her service." Briefly, the Premier stated that on Thursday the Government hoped to be able to introduce an effective measure for the better prevention of crime in Ireland, and promised that the Ministerial bill dealing with Irish arrears of rent should be brought forward on an early date. On the part of the Opposition, Sir Stafford Northcote seconded the Premier's motion with all the kindness natural to him. It was in the voice of one individually stricken by the terrible occurrence that Mr. Parnell expressed, in the name of the Home-Rule Party, "most unqualified detestation of the horrible crime"—"committed by men who absolutely detest the cause with which I have been associated." Mr. Forster's eulogy of his murdered successor and Mr. Burke called up Mr. Lowther with a fresh tribute to the late Under-Secretary. But, though the House adjourned, hon. members seemed loth to separate, Conservatives gathering round the Leaders of the Opposition in subdued conversation, Mr. Parnell consulting with a small group of Irish members below the gangway, and Ministers holding an impromptu council behind the Speaker's Chair.

The House of Lords was not at all so full when Earl Granville, in moving the adjournment, though struggling against emotion, paid the most eloquent tribute of all to the high character of Lord Frederick Cavendish. The Foreign Secretary (who repaired an omission of the Premier, and included the bill dealing with the Bright clauses of the Land Act among the measures to be introduced this Session) was followed in similarly sympathetic speeches from the Marquis of Salisbury, Earl Cowper, the Duke of Marlborough, and Lord Curzon, whose panegyric of Mr. Burke was the more appropriate inasmuch as he once occupied the confidential position of his Lordship's private secretary.

The malignant endeavour of some publicists to throw obloquy upon the Government by pointing to Mr. Forster's resignation and then to the murders in Dublin as cause and effect should fall to the ground when it is remembered that the monstrous crime was committed under the system of police sanctioned by the ex-Chief Secretary—a system it could not have been possible for Earl Spencer or Lord Frederick Cavendish to have revised, inasmuch as they were not sworn in until the very afternoon of the assassinations. Quite eclipsed by the deplorable event of Saturday last, the scene in the House of Commons on Thursday week, when Mr. Forster gave his reasons for resigning and Messrs. Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly resumed their seats, may yet be deemed of sufficient gravity to be shortly commented on. Mr. Forster's explanation was practically a speech of censure against the Government. Its gist was that he resigned because the Ministry did not agree with him that either certain promises should be exacted from the imprisoned members before their liberation, or that they should be detained in Kilmalham till Ireland was in a more satisfactory condition, or another Coercion Act was passed to take the place of the existing Act. The carefully written and learnt address was altogether far more palatable to the Conservatives than to the Ministerial side of the House. It gave rise to a whole evening's debate on the state of Ireland, the other most noteworthy incident of which was the diplomatic conversation between Mr. Parnell and Mr. Gladstone.

With what dispatch the Commons can transact the business of legislation when systematic Obstruction is abandoned was shown on Tuesday. After Wednesday's short sitting came the mournful duty of paying the last mark of respect to a noble life at the graveside of Lord Frederick Cavendish at Chatsworth, on Thursday.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

The Senate on the 4th inst., by 126 votes to 71, passed the bill providing for the establishment of the system of voting by large constituencies, after rejecting all amendments.

On Tuesday the Treaty of Commerce between Italy and France was voted by the Chamber.

SPAIN.

The debate in the Senate upon the Commercial Treaty with France came to a close on Monday evening; and the Treaty was carried by 135 against 85.

PORTUGAL.

The Pombal Centenary Festivities at Lisbon extended over two days. On Monday the King laid the foundation-stone of a monument to the memory of Pombal. The concourse of people was enormous, and the weather was splendid.

HOLLAND.

On the 4th inst., the representatives of the Netherlands, Belgium, France, Germany, Great Britain, Denmark, and Norway and Sweden met at the Hague to conclude the convention for regulating the police of the fisheries in the North Sea.

The Ministry has resigned, in consequence of the rejection by the Second Chamber, for the second time, of the Franco-Dutch Commercial Treaty.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

After rejecting all amendments, the Lower House of the Reichsrath on the 4th inst. agreed to the duties on flour and articles made from flour, in accordance with the proposals of the committee. On the 5th inst. the Lower House adopted the proposals of the majority of the committee as to the Customs duties on cattle, game, and animal products.

The Upper House of the Hungarian Diet has adopted the Bill for the amendment of the military law.

GERMANY.

A Royal salute of a hundred and one guns announced to Berlin on Sunday morning the birth of a son to Prince William of Prussia. The joyful event, which took place on Saturday night at Potsdam, gives the German Emperor a great-grandson and a third successive heir to the German and Russian Crowns in the direct line. The infant Prince is also a great-grandson of Queen Victoria, and grandson of the Crown Prince and Crown Princess of Germany. The Princess William and her son are progressing very satisfactorily.

The Lower House of the Prussian Diet on the 4th inst. adopted the Ecclesiastical Bill with the amendments introduced by the Upper House. The Session closed on Thursday.

DENMARK.

The joint committee of the two Houses of the Legislature has adopted a compromise on the Budget question by 19 votes to 4, seven members refraining from voting.

RUSSIA.

It is announced that the Imperial family will, on the 17th inst., proceed to Peterhof, and remain there for the accompaniment of the Empress. After her Majesty's recovery the Imperial family will leave for the Jilnska Castle, near Moscow. Just before the coronation of the Czar the Court will proceed to the Petroska Castle, whence their Majesties will enter Moscow in State.

The Chinese troops have reoccupied Kuldja, which was peacefully evacuated by the Russians.

GREECE.

King George on the 4th inst. turned the first turf of the new canal which is to be constructed through the Isthmus of Corinth, in the presence of 5000 spectators.

Lord and Lady Dufferin have arrived at Athens from Constantinople.

TURKEY.

The convention between the Porte and Russia, arranging the terms for the payment of the war indemnity, was signed on Wednesday at the Russian Embassy. The final decision about the War Indemnity which Russia claims from Turkey is that the latter country shall pay annually three hundred and fifty thousand liras, which are to be raised by five vilayets that are named in the arrangement.

Further changes in the Cabinet were officially announced on Tuesday.

EGYPT.

On Tuesday the Khedive signed a decree, commuting into simple exile the sentence of the court-martial upon the Circassian officers and their accomplices. The decree was issued after consultation with the diplomatic agents of England and France.

Trouble has again arisen for Egypt in the Sudan. The "false prophet" of last year, at the head of 8000 men, said to be well armed, has been once more in active revolt, and in his first encounter defeated the Egyptian troops. He was advancing on Khartoum. According to official news published in Cairo, however, he has been killed by the Egyptian troops, and his followers have dispersed. But this intelligence seems to lack confirmation.

AMERICA.

President Arthur has signed the Chinese Exclusion Bill, which had been passed, with amendments, by both branches of the United States Legislature.

The Supreme Court has found that the court-martial had full power to try Sergeant Mason, the man who shot at Giteau while he was in prison. The Court accordingly refused the petition for habeas corpus made in Mason's behalf, and discharged the rule to show cause.

Mr. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, has received a telegram from Mr. Melville, the engineer of the Jeannette, dated from the delta of the Lena river, March 24, announcing that he has found Lieutenant De Long and his party dead. He was, however, continuing his search for Lieutenant Chipp, the commander of the second cutter.

In the month of April last about 27,000 Germans emigrated to the United States. Twenty-one steamers landed 17,212 emigrants at Castle Garden, New York, last week.

CANADA.

The Dominion Senate have adopted, by 36 votes to 5, the Address to the Queen, which was unanimously agreed to by the Lower House, praying that Ireland should be granted a form of self-government, and that clemency should be extended to the political prisoners. The Montreal Telegraph Company Amalgamation Bill has been passed in the Senate.

The House of Commons have negatived a motion condemning the Ministerial proposal to increase the estimates of expenditure. The supplementary estimates for 1883, amounting to 2,000,000 dols., have been laid before the House.

According to official returns, the revenue of the Dominion in April last amounted to 2,600,000 dols., and the expenditure to 1,700,000 dols. During the ten months ending April 30 the revenue was 27,000,000 dols., and the expenditure 19,500,000 dols. The value of the exports of Canadian products in March reached 3,500,000 dols.

The Legislature of Quebec has passed a bill authorising the sale of the eastern section of the Quebec, Montreal, and Ottawa Occidental Railway.

The address in reply to the speech of the Lieutenant Governor of Manitoba has been adopted by the Assembly.

MAY-DAY PROCESSION OF HORSES.

At Newcastle, on the first day of May, the annual exhibition of cart-horses, which is of some importance in the district, was accompanied by an interesting procession of those animals and other beasts of draught service through the streets of the town. Lady Burdett-Coutts, one of the patrons of this exhibition, was present, with the Mayor and Mayoress, among the spectators. The total number of horses and other animals was 1079, and they comprised 982 horses and ponies, 77 pit ponies, 16 asses, 3 mules, and 1 elephant. There were 650 conveyances (carts, rolleys, cabs, vans, &c.), with one horse and with two horses, and 66 vehicles with two horses. Most of them were gaily decorated; they assembled in the streets adjoining Scotswood-road, and started from the Cattle Market, the route being as follows:—Clayton-street West, Clayton-street East, Blackett-street, Grainger-street, Grainger-street West, Neville-street, Collingwood-street, Mosley-street, Grey-street, Market-street, Pilgrim-street, and Northumberland-street, up to the Haymarket. The procession returned by Percy-street and Newgate-street to the Cattle Market. It was headed by three large waggons, each drawn by four fine horses beautifully decorated; and each of the three waggons contained three tiers of tobacco. These were followed by eighty waggons of the North-Eastern Railway Company, which attracted much attention, and by four parcel vans, with eleven chain horses, very fine animals. One waggon was covered with moss and flowers, flowering plants, and shrubs, tastefully arranged, and the horse was decorated with fruit blossoms. The waggons and drays were laden with great quantities of the special wares in which their owners deal, such as coals, ironwork, and machinery, casks of beer, firkins of butter, grain, fruit, vegetables, and meat, forming good advertisements of their trade. An interesting feature in the procession was the pit ponies. The first lot consisted of about forty ponies of various collieries. About one half of this number was attached to tubs, and driven by young pit lads in working dress, and the rest of the ponies in the first lot were led by pitmen. The route was kept clear by mounted marshals and a detachment of police. The public of Newcastle are indebted to Mr. Councillor Ellis and his brother, Mr. J. B. Ellis (Messrs. Hindhaugh and Co., seedsmen), as the originators of the May-Day processions. Seven years ago they decorated their own horses on May 1. In the next year Messrs. Oubridge also decorated their horses. Last year the May-Day procession was extended, and a committee was formed to carry out processions in future years. The following gentlemen formed the committee:—Messrs. R. L. Dunford, E. Dunford, A. Tindall, T. Gradon, C. Harrison, jun., R. Dove, R. Newton, A. Moscrop, G. Elphick, J. J. Walton, R. Crow. The treasurer was Mr. Barker Ellis, Cloth Market; and the hon. secretary was Mr. John M. Oubridge. The committee were fortunate in securing a good president in Councillor C. J. Jackson. Among the Sketches of our Artist illustrating this procession, the central figure is that of a horse belonging to the North-Eastern Railway Company, the winner of the silver cup given for the championship prize. The four surrounding Sketches represent—1, the window of the Bank of England, in Grey-street, at which Lady Burdett-Coutts and her husband sat to view the procession; 2, the procession passing the Stephenson Monument; 3, a group of the pit ponies, and boys with them, above noticed; 4, the Baroness distributing prizes in the circus, and shaking hands with one of these boys, who had been judged deserving of a prize.

GENERAL HOME NEWS.

Mr. T. Harry read a paper on the Northern Territory of South Australia at a meeting of the Royal Colonial Institute.

Yesterday week Mr. Walpole was sworn in, at the ancient fortress of Castle Rushen, as Governor of Isle of Man.

"The Sportsman's Guide to Scotland," admirably edited by Mr. Watson Lyall, contains time-tables for the northern railways, and notes on rivers, lochs, burns, moors, and forests.

Mr. Frederick Whitting, M.A., King's College, Cambridge, was yesterday week elected to fill the vacancy caused in the Council of the Senate by Mr. Van Sittart's death.

The Hon. and Rev. William H. Fremantle, M.A., formerly Fellow of All Souls' College, Oxford, has been elected Bampton lecturer for the ensuing year.

The coaches of the Coaching Club meet at the Magazine, Hyde Park, to-day (Saturday), at twelve o'clock, to drive to the Star and Garter for luncheon.

With the approval of the Treasury, Mr. P. Edward Dove, of Lincoln's Inn, has been appointed secretary to the Transit of Venus Commission.

Mr. Dugdale, the owner of Baddeley Colliery, has died from the injuries which he received whilst endeavouring, with others, to rescue the entombed miners. Mr. Pogmore, the agent, another of the party, is also dead, and his son lies in a precarious condition.

At the Warwick Assizes on Monday Frederica de Fumieux and James Gething were indicted for having obtained money by false pretences. Both prisoners, when charged, pleaded not guilty; but, so far as the female prisoner was concerned, she withdrew this plea during the progress of the case, and upon conviction was sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. Gething was acquitted.

The Earl of Denbigh has consented to act as President of the centre of the St. John Ambulance Association recently formed at Coventry. Classes for both sexes, largely attended, are receiving instruction at that centre in the first treatment of injured persons. On the 22nd ult. certificates were presented to the Malta classes in the ball-room of the Palace at Valetta by the Governor, General Sir Arthur Borton, President of the centre.

Nearly 10,000 of the Metropolitan Volunteers were under arms last Saturday; the principal work engaged in being the annual official brigade drills in Hyde Park and Wimbledon, in which ten regiments were represented. Four out of the five regiments composing the City Volunteer force—namely, the 1st London Artillery, 1st London Engineers, 2nd London Rifles, and 3rd London Rifles—mustered at Finsbury-circus, whence they marched through the City and West-End to Hyde Park. The London Rifle Brigade were to have taken part in the march, but were prevented from doing so in consequence of having, with other regiments, to form a guard of honour for her Majesty at Epping. On arrival at the Embankment the brigade was met by Colonel Clive, Grenadier Guards, brigadier, with his brigade major and aide-de-camp, who ordered the formation of advance and rear guards with the usual connecting links, and thence the march was resumed to the park, where numerous movements were carried out. At Wimbledon six regiments were formed up for brigade drill, under the command of Colonel Moncrieff, Scots Guards, as follows:—South Middlesex Rifles, London Scottish Rifles, 10th Middlesex Rifles, Queen's Westminster Rifles, Inns of Court Rifles, and Artists' Rifles. Besides the above, some twelve other regiments were out.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The last day at Chester was about the most interesting of the three as far as the sport was concerned, and the weather was simply perfect. The easy victory of Gaydene (9 st. 10 lb.) in the Prince of Wales's Welter Handicap Cup considerably enhances the form of the leading trio in the One Thousand, as the filly, who can evidently race a bit, was almost beaten off in that event. Whipper In had no trouble in disposing of five moderate opponents for the Dee Stakes, and, after the race, found backers at outside prices for the Derby. Incendiary (7 st. 7 lb.) was once more heavily backed for the Great Cheshire Stakes, but again ran badly, and Pilgrim (7 st. 10 lb.) made amends for many previous disappointments by a clever victory from the useful Fiddler (8 st. 10 lb.); The Chirper (7 st. 7 lb.) ran so moderately that he will not prove of the smallest use as a trial-horse for Bruce. There was no real opposition to Tristan in the Queen's Plate, and M. Lefevre's much-improved colt looks like having a regular benefit in this class of race. Two very fair days' sport was provided at Kempton Park at the end of the week. A couple of events for juveniles fell to Madrid, who should do good service for Pero Gomez, and the Kempton Park May Handicap went to old Hesper (8 st. 6 lb.), whose resuscitation has proved a great success. It is now clear that there were good grounds for backing him so heavily for the Lincolnshire Handicap, and he ought to have run much better than he did in that race. Backers had a grand time of it on Saturday, every favourite except one proving successful, and Archer fairly eclipsed himself during the week, as he rode thirteen winners.

There was an unusually small attendance at the Newmarket Second Spring Meeting, the terrible tragedy in Dublin keeping at home many of the aristocratic followers of racing. In the Spring Two Year Old Stakes, Sir John Astley introduced us to a remarkably handsome filly by Alvarez, from Electric Light, who is, appropriately enough, named Lovely. She is said to be better than Petticoat, and the style in which she won certainly seems to favour this report. The Breeders' Plate appeared so completely at the mercy of Rookery that it was a case of "20 to 1 bar one," and there was great excitement when Tyndrum fairly got to her head, and made a resolute bid for victory. She eventually landed the long odds laid on her by a neck; but we doubt if the result ought ever to have been in jeopardy, and Wynne, great as is his reputation in Ireland, scarcely acquitted himself in the style of a Fordham or Cannon. The next performance of Rookery will, however, excite much interest. Lowland Chief (8 st. 11 lb.) followed up his success at Kempton Park by beating a very large field for the Visitors' Plate, in which race Mistake (9 st. 7 lb.) was the absolute last. Webb then vacated his saddle for Luke, and, with 8 st. on his back, and after a short half-hour's rest, the American horse fairly ran away with the Newmarket Spring Handicap. Pebble could not concede 8 lb. to Hauteur in a sweepstakes over the last five furlongs of the D.M., and it is noticeable that easily as Hauteur—a son of Rosicrucian and Hawthorndale—won on this occasion, he could make no sort of a fight with Rookery at Epsom.

At Ashcombe Park, near Leek, Staffordshire, on Saturday last, in a match between Ashcombe Park and Tunstall, James Walker (professional cricketer at Ashcombe Park) accomplished the unparalleled feat of capturing eight wickets in eight consecutive balls—five clean bowled, two caught, and one l.b.w. The Tunstall team scored 2 runs in the first and 6 runs in the second innings. Walker's bowling analysis is well worthy of notice—2 overs and 3 balls, 9 wickets, no runs.

The final heats of the Chinnery Regatta, which took place last Saturday, were very unsatisfactory. The junior prize went to H. Follett, of Richmond, who is very likely the best man of the four; still Pearce was considerably interfered with by Driver. Matters were infinitely worse in the race for seniors, as G. Perkins, who possessed no chance himself, first fouled Godwin and put him right out of it, and then steered across the river to Largan, and, managing to get their boats fairly locked together, completely stopped him. In consequence of this disgraceful conduct L. Gibson, a much inferior man to Largan, won easily; and such performances as these are a very poor return for the great liberality shown by the Messrs. Chinnery in presenting £200 per annum for the encouragement of professional scullers.

A notice of the May magazines and many other articles are unavoidably deferred.

The anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum will be celebrated next Wednesday in the Crystal Palace, Mr. William Hoare, of the eminent firm of brewers, in the chair.

The annual meeting of the Society for Promoting the Employment of Women, 22, Berners-street, is announced to be held at the office, on Friday (yesterday) afternoon, Lord Shaftesbury, the president, in the chair.

Lord Salisbury presided at the dinner of the Royal Literary Fund last week, and dwelt upon the long career of usefulness which that institution had pursued to succour a class of men who had shown much devotion to culture. The subscriptions amounted to upwards of £1000, including one hundred guineas from the Queen. The fund rendered assistance last year to thirty-eight persons, among whom are eight widows and one orphan. The grants averaged nearly £50 each, the total amount bestowed being £1965. In twelve cases only the relief was given for the first time. These received among them £900. One figures as being relieved for the tenth time, and two for the fourteenth time.

According to the "Statistical Register," recently issued, there has been a steady increase in the population of South Australia, from 185,626 in 1871 to 279,865 on the census returns day, April 3 of last year. Thirty years ago the total number of inhabitants was scarcely 35,000. The whole area of the land in the thirty-six counties is 37,725,440 acres, of which 9,212,415 have been purchased from the Crown. The public debt has increased from £2,174,000 in 1873 to £9,865,500 at the beginning of 1881. The entire revenue amounts to £2,027,963, derived from land sales, rents, railways, post-office, customs, and general taxation, the customs income alone being £517,631, a little more than one fourth of the sum.

The Gazette announces that the Earl of Aberdeen has been appointed her Majesty's High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.—The Synod of the United Presbyterian Church opened its sittings in Edinburgh on Monday evening, when Dr. David Young, of Glasgow, was unanimously elected Moderator for the current year.—Under the presidency of the Rev. Dr. Macfadyen, of Manchester, there was a very large attendance at the Memorial Hall, Farringdon-street, at the first meeting in connection with the Spring Session (the jubilee commemoration) of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. The Rev. Dr. Fairbairn, of Manchester, was elected chairman of the Union for the ensuing year. Dr. Parker was again nominated, but was defeated by a majority of 50.

THE COURT.

Last Saturday was fraught with varied incident for her Majesty. She received the happy intelligence of the safe accouchement of Princess William of Prussia and of the birth of her Majesty's first great-grandson.

With acute grief the Queen received the horrible news of the assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish, Chief Secretary, and Mr. Burke, Under-Secretary for Ireland, within a few hours of Lord Frederick's arrival in Dublin. Her Majesty's condolence and sympathy were immediately conveyed to Lady Frederick Cavendish in town.

The much-looked-for Royal visit to Epping Forest was made in the afternoon, amidst the boundless enthusiasm of the denizens of the eastern quarter of the metropolis. The Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, was met at Chingford railway station by Princess Louise of Lorne and the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. Details of the proceedings, with illustrations, are given on another page.

Divine service was performed on Sunday in the private chapel of the castle by the Rev. Canon Barry, the Queen and Princess Beatrice being present. Her Majesty and the Princess drove out in the afternoon. Mr. Reginald Brett, M.P., private secretary to the Marquis of Hartington, and Lieutenant Ross of Bladensburg, Coldstream Guards, who arrived from Dublin Castle, had audiences of the Queen; and the Dean of Windsor and the Hon. Mrs. Wellesley and General the Right Hon. Sir H. and the Hon. Lady Ponsonby dined with her Majesty.

A congratulatory address from the borough of Windsor on the recent Royal marriage was presented to the Queen on Monday at the castle by the Mayor and Corporation, to which her Majesty, who was accompanied by Princess Beatrice, replied. Other congratulations have also been accepted by the Queen upon the event; and during a recent visit of Princess Louise of Lorne at the castle her Royal Highness presented an address from the women of Canada congratulating her Majesty upon her late preservation from danger. Earl Cowper had an audience of the Queen. Her Majesty's dinner party included Princess Beatrice, the Dowager Duchess of Athole, the Dowager Marchioness of Ely, Earl and Countess Cowper, Lieutenant-General Sir Garnet Wolsley, Colonel Lord Edward Pelham Clinton, and Captain Edwards.

The Queen, with Princess Beatrice, came to Buckingham Palace on Tuesday, being escorted from Paddington by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards. Her Majesty held a Drawingroom, at which were present the Prince of Wales, the Grand Duke and Princess Victoria of Hesse, the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Crown Prince of Denmark, Prince Frederick William of Hesse, Prince and Princess Christian, Princess Beatrice, the Duke of Edinburgh, and the Duke of Cambridge. It was a large Drawingroom, 300 presentations being made.

Her Majesty held another Drawingroom on Thursday. A dinner and a ball were given yesterday week at Balmoral Castle to celebrate the Duke of Albany's marriage. Dr. Profeit, her Majesty's Commissioner, presided at the dinner.

Mr. Archer, Agent-General for Queensland, has presented to the Queen, by Earl Spencer, an album containing a record of the visit of Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales to that colony.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have entertained various relatives during the week, including Prince and Princess Christian, Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg, and Prince Frederick William of Hesse. The Grand Duke and Princess Victoria of Hesse came from Windsor last Saturday to stay with their Royal Highnesses; the Crown Prince of Denmark being also on a visit at Marlborough House. The Prince and Princess, with a large party, have patronised Her Majesty's Theatre to witness the performance of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen." Their Royal Highnesses and their guests visited Mr. Arthur Lucas's exhibition of pictures commemorating of Sir Francis Drake and his contemporaries, at Messrs. Graves's establishment in Pall-mall, on Monday. The Prince, with the Duke of Teck, was in the House of Commons during the discussion of the mournful facts of the deaths of the Chief and Under Secretaries for Ireland. His Royal Highness and the Princess were among the first who called upon Lady Frederick Cavendish to express their sympathy. The Prince attended the Queen's Drawing-rooms.

Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales arrived at Beyrouth last Saturday. They were met half an hour's journey from the town by Rustum Pasha, the governor of Lebanon, the principal municipal authorities of Beyrouth, and a battalion of Turkish troops. The Princes were escorted to the British Consulate, where they lunched; after which they embarked in the Bacchante and entertained at dinner Ahmed Bey, aide-de-camp to the Sultan, who had been specially placed by his Majesty at the disposal of their Royal Highnesses. The Bacchante left on Sunday for Athens.

Prince and Princess Christian dined a few days since with the Right Hon. W. H. and Mrs. Smith. His Royal Highness presided at the final meeting of the Frank Buckland Memorial Fund last Saturday at 34, Portland-place.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh dined with the First Lord of the Admiralty and Lady Emma Baring at the Admiralty, Whitehall, on Saturday. Later, there was a small and early party to meet the Duke and Duchess.

The Duchess of Albany has been invested by the Queen with the Imperial Order of the Crown of India. The Duchess has appointed, with her Majesty's approval, the Hon. Mrs. Richard Moreton to be Lady of the Bedchamber to her Royal Highness, and the Hon. Mrs. Henry Bourke and Lady Knightley to be Extra Ladies in Waiting on her.

The Duke of Cambridge dined with Mr. and Mrs. Hussey Vivian on Saturday at their residence in Belgrave-square; and the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz dined with Earl and Countess Sydney at their residence in St. James's-square, Cleveland.

Prince and Princess Philip of Saxe-Coburg have left town for Paris en route for Germany.

Prince Frederick William of Hesse dined at the mess of the Hon. Corps of Gentlemen at Arms in St. James's Palace on Tuesday.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.

If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath.

Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth, on all parasites or living animalcules, leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as sherry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.

MRS. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR

RESTORE is perfection for restoring grey, white, or faded hair to its youthful colour, gloss, and beauty. It renews its life strength, and growth, and is quickly removed. A matchless Hair Dressing. Its perfume rich and rare. MORE ECONOMICAL, remarkable certainty of prompt action—in fact, every good quality is guaranteed for Mrs. S. A. ALLEN'S WORLD'S HAIR RESTORE.

BRIDAL BOUQUET BLOOM.—A lovely liquid for beautifying the Complexion. Ever young. One trial of it will convince any lady of its great superiority over any other liquid or face powder. In moment of time it imparts to the face, neck, arms and hands a delicate softness and marble purity, with the tint and fragrance of the lily and the rose. It removes Tan, Freckles, Sunburn, and all roughness and blemishes. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored

by this specific: after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Unequalled as a dressing: it causes growth, arrests falling, and its use defies detection. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials free.—Agents, R. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

ROBARE'S AUREOLINE, or GOLDEN

HAIR WASH.—For producing the beautiful golden colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all principal Perfumers and Chemists throughout the world.—Agents, R. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

CHAS. CODD'S ORANGE CHAMPAGNE is made simply from oranges. It is a light and wholesome tonic, and being free from chemicals as well as spirit, it is the purest and best of the non-alcoholic drinks. Price, in London, in large champagne bottles, 7s. per dozen; in small, 4s. Bottles charged 2s., and same allowed when returned.—C. Codd and Co., 79, Copenhagen-street, London. Sold by all Grocers, Chemists, and Wine Merchants.

FOR BREAKFAST.

"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operation of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle poisons are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

Made simply with boiling water or milk. Sold only in Packets, labelled.

THE PARIS SALON.

As is generally the case, public opinion is divided as to the merits of the Salon; one party, and perhaps the more numerous of the two, asserting that it is the best that has been held for some years, while the other depreciates this idea entirely, and affirms with equal confidence that, but for the force with which certain young painters come to the front, the Salon would be more than ordinarily dull and unprofitable.

The truth, almost as a matter of course, lies between the two extremes; and without detracting from the well-won merits of the young men, about whom more presently, our conclusion is that the exhibition, even in their absence, would have been a fair average one.

The number of works on view amounts in all to 5641, and these, our readers will please to remember, include painting, sculpture, architecture, engraving, lithography, die-sinking, gem-engraving, and the like. This is in excess of last year by as many as 682 exhibits; and, although the committee of artists into whose hands the Government have placed the entire administration of the Salon, have widened their borders, they have not relaxed one iota in the rigour with which every work claiming admission was examined. The system has been in operation for two years, and now that the initiatory friction is gone it seems to work well.

At the top of the grand staircase is placed the most remarkable mural work in the exhibition—remarkable for its size (it is quite seventy feet long); for the light key in which it is painted (doubtless not to disturb its architectural surroundings in its final resting-place at Amiens), and for the quiet idyllic treatment of its subject. It is entitled "Young Picards Practising Throwing the Lance." On a long level stretch of ground, with some thatched dwellings on the extreme left, before which the women attend to their domestic duties, while the children play about; and, with some poplars and other trees intervening, the stump of an old tree on the extreme right, which serves as a target, we see the youth of the neighbourhood exercising themselves with the lance. Immediately beyond is a placid lake, and the whole scene is indicative of quiet enjoyment.

There is, says Victor Hugo, human nature, and there is French nature; and we cannot help thinking that, in this case at least, M. Puvis de Chavannes, the author of this noble work, has abjured the latter and stuck manfully and loyally by human nature. It is in this that the great merit of his work lies, and there is little doubt but it will command the highest honour which it is in the power of the jury to confer. We noticed, with emphatic commendation, when it occupied the same place as a cartoon, and we are glad to find our opinion confirmed, now that it comes before us in quiet unobtrusive colour.

Those curious in the personal appearance of great artists will find an admirable life-size portrait of him by Léon Bonnat, and in spite of the touch of grey which time has given his beard will rejoice to discover that he is still a vigorous upstanding man. There are many other notable portraits in the exhibition, of which more by-and-by: it will suffice to remark in the meantime that the honours in this department of art are not monopolised by Frenchmen.

Entering the Salon carré, we have on our right an immense canvas, on which we see depicted a scene eminently dramatic, by Joseph Wencker. From a lofty pulpit we behold Saint Chrysostom, in white surplice, thundering with impassioned voice and gesture against the Empress Eudoxia, who, surrounded by the ladies of her startled Court, sits supremely defiant in a high recessed gallery, or alcove, while the red-robed cardinals below, and the general congregation in the immediate front of the picture, express in their various ways their surprise and horror at the audacity of the preacher. It is in this especially that the artist shows his power. The colouring is besettingly sober and low toned; but the reds in the picture strike the eye rather crudely and harshly. The attitude of the priest himself is simply magnificent.

The pendant to this hangs opposite, and is similarly portentous in size. It represents a tumultuously joyous celebration of "the 14th July, 1880." On the extreme left is a raised orchestra, and, all under a bright summer sky, flecked with fleecy clouds, old and young, rich and poor, enjoy themselves with Parisian hilarity. The scene is altogether brilliant and life-like; but, though there is palpable unity of sentiment, there is scarcely unity of composition and arrangements; and no doubt the artist, A. P. Roll, was justified in making the most prominent figure in the foreground a merry little gamin selling appropriate favours. Carlo Stratta, of Turin, in depicting a similar scene of jollity, is scarcely so vivid in colour, perhaps; but he has been more fortunate in composition, inasmuch as, in his "Carnival at Villiers-le-Bel," he makes the clown gesticulating from the platform the focal figure of the crowd.

Another large canvas remarkable for concentrated force is by J. Ulysse-Roy, of Bordeaux. It represents Amurath the Second, mounted on a great black, rearing charger, grasping banner in one hand and hurling threatening and slaughter with the other against the Christians for the death of his comrade, who, with his white horse, lies at his feet.

Opposite this hangs a large upright picture representing some peasants praying devoutly at one of those lofty crucifixes so familiar to us at French ports. We see the jetty running out into the sea, and far to the left sails away, under a rather threatening sky, the ship containing those they hold so dear, and for whom they now pray with such fervent emotion. The artist is G. Haquette, and he studied under both Millet and Cabanel. Max Leenhardt has depicted for us with painful realism the stir and horror caused by a "Village Murder"; while Maurice Leloir, more loyal to the ultimate ends of art, shows a merry music party in a boat.

Then in the way of high-class landscape we have the "Close of Autumn," by L. Loir, the "Borders of a Wooded Lake," with cows and sheep, by E. V. Hareux; a small picture by a Spanish painter named Sanchez-Perrier, showing the "last leaves" of autumn, which for delicacy and truth we think worthy of Corot; a larger and more important one, by L. V. Watelin, showing a grey road leading through a green landscape towards a village; a very lively and faithful "Port of Saint Bernard, Paris," by P. L. L. Vauthier; and a no less faithfully treated "Spring-Time," by Ernest A. Waterlow.

Englishmen, indeed, or at least English-speaking men, by which phrase, of course, we include our cousins of the United States, have rather distinguished themselves in the present Exhibition. The "Dancing Gipsy Woman" of John S. Sargent, who is of American parentage, though born in Florence, is, perhaps, the most forcible picture in the Velasquez direction in the whole exhibition; and, if his being a foreigner will hinder his taking the highest medal, it need not prevent his being decorated with the Legion of Honour. Then there are the Brothers Harrison, William Stott, John R. Reid, Robert Macbeth, L. Welden Hawkins, Alexander Mann, not to mention the men from Eastern Europe, such as the Poles, Svedonisky, Szyndler, Bakalowicz, and the men of other nationalities, who have helped to give distinction to the present Salon. About these and others we hope to have the opportunity of saying a few words next week. J. F. R.

PANORAMA OF THE BATTLE OF CHAMPIGNY.

The eminent painters Messrs. De Neuville and Detaille have combined to paint one of the most striking panoramas of the many that have hitherto been produced. It represents the Battle of Champigny, which was fought some nine miles from Paris in December, 1870, and which, in its earlier phase, gave the French a gleam of hope. The chief point of interest lies in a battered lime-mill, in which a crowd of German soldiers are hemmed, and holding up the butt-end of their guns in token of surrender. It is a raw, grey winter's day, and all the sickening and heroic details of an extended battle-field are given with the most startling realisation. The Gardes Mobiles fight gallantly side by side with their comrades of the Line, while, in other parts of the field, we see the brotherhood and the surgeons fulfilling their functions with equal devotion. An old grey horse, standing by his upturned cart at the corner of a small ploughed field as quietly and unconcernedly as if there were no bullets whistling through the air and he were located in his own native meadow, is one of the most touching incidents in the whole panorama. It was thrown open to the public on Monday, and is situated in the Rue de Berri, a few yards off the Avenue des Champs Elysées.

THE HARRIER WEEK ON DARTMOOR.

In almost every other part of the country the "currant jelly dogs" have had their last run before the first of May, which is the date fixed for the beginning of the harrier week on Dartmoor. Great interest is taken in the sport, and large numbers of people attend, often as many as four hundred being present at a meet. Dartmoor affords a splendid country, both for hunting and also for the spectators, as, from the tops of some of the higher tors, it is often possible to witness the whole of a run. In some respects, indeed, the foot people have the best of it, as a rider occasionally finds himself in an awkward fix. He is often stopped by a bog, and, should he not pull up in time, his horse is apt to become a fixture, often sinking in up to his girths, and sometimes even further. He must then be fairly dragged out with ropes, and it is singular how promptly a countryman or two turn up on the spot, ready to earn an honest penny by assisting in this labour. Sometimes two or three horses get stogged—to use the local term—simultaneously, and these misfortunes, though vexatious enough to the luckless riders, afford plenty of amusement to the lookers-on.

THE ST. GOTHARD RAILWAY TUNNEL.

The ceremonial and festivities attending the completion of this great work, and the opening of the line to public traffic, attract a great number of visitors; and our illustrations of the romantic Alpine scenery, and of the workmen employed in the construction of the tunnel, will be viewed with some interest. The St. Gothard Tunnel is 14,900 metres long, being 2667 metres more than that of Mont Cenis. It runs in a straight line from the village of Göschenen, on the Swiss side, to the Italian frontier locality of Airolo, placing Lucerne and Milan in communication by rail. The works were begun in October, 1872, and have extended over a period of ten years. The St. Gothard Tunnel, which has been largely subsidised by the German Government, is to Germany, for communication with Italy, what the Mont Cenis is to France. Henceforth Germany will be independent of France for traffic with Italy. From a commercial point of view the importance of this work can scarcely be overrated. Apart from the enormous increase of local trade which may safely be reckoned upon, the new Alpine tunnel will be the most advantageous route to Italy, the Mediterranean, and the East for passengers and goods coming from England, Germany, Holland, and Belgium. It is thought in Switzerland that the overland mail will take this road in preference to Mont Cenis, which is worked partly by the Paris, Lyons, and Mediterranean Company and partly by an Italian company.

We learn from a report by M. Bridel, Engineer-in-chief to the St. Gothard Railway, that the traffic through the tunnel is worked at present by two 12-ton tank engines, intended ultimately to work the branch line from Cadenazzo to Locarno, which is seven and a-half miles long, and has a ruling gradient of 1 in 528. These two engines are found quite powerful enough for the work at present being done. They take four trains each way through the tunnel during each twenty-four hours, and the ventilation is found to be very good. M. Bridel estimates the number of travellers for January as 3277, for February as 4300, and for March as 9100, and that about thirty trains per day will traverse the tunnel, but he is casting about for a substitute for the ordinary engine. He tried a compressed-air engine, which did not answer; and he has now turned his attention to electricity. He has communicated with Messrs. Siemens, and they have arranged for a small experimental apparatus, very similar to that employed in the Berlin Electric Railway. Each dynamo engine is to be of about 100 indicated horse-power, and two, three, or more are to be attached to each train, as required. In case the scheme does not succeed, the loss will amount to 80,000*fr.* only, Messrs. Siemens taking the plant off the hands of the railway company.

EXHIBITION OF SHIP-BUILDING MODELS.

The exhibition opened in Fishmongers' Hall last week, by His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, was got up by the Shipwrights' Company of the City of London, but the Admiralty and the naval authorities of different countries, as well as private ship-builders, contributed to the large collection of models. A similar exhibition was held by this company in 1877, also in the hall of the Fishmongers' Company, when prizes were competed for by British naval architects only. The present exhibition has invited universal competition, and its invitation has been widely responded to. There were models and designs of vessels of all classes, both for peace and war, as well as ships of historical interest. From the national collection at the Hague, from Norway, France, the United States, and elsewhere interesting contributions had been sent. From the Naval Museum at Greenwich, by the kindness of the Lords of the Admiralty, among others, models of the Royal Sovereign, a vessel of the time of James I., and of Nelson's flag-ship the Victory, had been lent; while Norway had contributed a model of the Viking ship, 1000 years old. The King of the Netherlands had appointed one of the Dutch Admirals to represent his Majesty, and Russia, Japan, and Norway had also appointed delegates.

An account of the public income and expenditure of the United Kingdom for the year ended March 31, 1882, has been issued as a Parliamentary paper. From this it appears that the income was £86,823,581, and the expenditure £85,472,556.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

ORIGIN AND MIGRATION OF MYTHS.

Dr. Edward B. Tylor, F.R.S., in his third lecture on the History of Customs and Beliefs, given on Tuesday, the 2nd inst., commented on the metaphorical and fancy keys devised to account for and interpret myths, which, though of a somewhat intangible character, have exercised an important influence upon the lives and fortunes of men. Referring to the classic story of Andromeda chained to the rock, and her rescue by Perseus, which has been interpreted as the Sun delivering the Dawn from a Storm Cloud, he adduced examples in favour of his opinion that this myth might have its origin in facts, and that in this and other cases there was no necessity to have recourse to cosmical phenomena for their source. He mentioned instances of the exposure of women to the sea and its monsters in the South Seas. The Greek myth of the Symplegades, the two rocks which were said to clash together and destroy the ships passing between them, from which the ship Argo narrowly escaped. The exposition of these rocks signifying the gates of night and day; and the migration of the myth into India, and its existence in Buddhist legends, were specially commented on. The origin of the popular division of the world into four quarters, and the four cardinal points of the compass were next considered, and, among other interesting illustrations, reference was made to a picture found in Central America, which was explained to record the arrival of four great chiefs who came from different quarters to colonise Yucatan. After protesting against the too great application of ingenuity and analogy in tracing the history of myths, Dr. Tylor concluded with comments on the very general traditions respecting a deluge, of which he had collected and classified a very great number of examples; and he demonstrated that a great many supposed ancient legends found amongst savage nations were really derived from missionaries and other Europeans and dressed up by native imaginations to suit their own tastes.

PROPERTIES OF THE METALS.

Professor Dewar, in his third lecture, given on Thursday, the 4th inst., resumed his explanations of the physical properties of the metals, by illustrations of their specific heat, and of its relation to their specific weight or gravity. This has been reduced to a law, which has been found to hold good with all the metals—the unit being the amount of heat required to raise one pound of water one degree of temperature. To this law gallium and other newly-discovered metals have been found to conform; but not the elements carbon, boron, and silicon. The Professor then described several methods of detecting and graduating extremely minute variations of temperature; including the calorimeter employed by Laplace and Lavoisier, based upon ascertaining the exact amount of heat required to melt a certain quantity of ice; and the improvements upon this method introduced by Herschel, Bunsen, and Andrews, by which means a very delicate thermometric apparatus has been produced, applicable to a great variety of purposes. Its principle consists in the very accurate determination of volume, which was experimentally illustrated. The Professor next showed how the gases in the interior of a flame might be extracted and analysed, and demonstrated that all ordinary flames produced not only carbonic acid and water, but also the hydrocarbon acetylene, the source of all the coal-tar colours, and which was also an important reducing agent in metallurgy. He also showed how the gases might be drawn off from the electric arc, in which was formed, by decomposition of the air, prussic or hydrocyanic acid, a cyanogen compound.

PROPER MOTIONS OF THE STARS.

Professor R. Grant, F.R.S., of the Observatory, Glasgow, gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, the 5th inst. He began with remarks on the general aspect of the heavens on a clear night, and allusions to the movements of the planets as distinguished from the other stars, which from their always retaining their relative position to each other have been termed "fixed stars." That these bodies have a movement of their own, termed their "proper motion," was not proved till after the invention of the telescope, which gave such a great impetus to astronomical research. In 1717 Edmund Halley determined the proper motion of three stars; and the important discoveries of Bradley in regard to the aberration of light verified the results obtained by Halley. In relation to this matter, Professor Grant described the interesting phenomena of the occultation of the moon, and the way astronomers have been able to determine the rate of the proper motion of many of the stars, and the time in which it takes place. He also described how, by means of the law of gravitation, the heavenly bodies may be weighed, and stated that the greater stars appear to have a small, and the smaller stars a large proper motion. Our sun being a star, has also been proved to have a proper motion. After remarks upon variable stars, which gradually lose their brightness, become invisible, and afterwards reappear, Professor Grant explained how the spectroscopic researches of Sir G. B. Airy, Mr. Huggins, and others, have, in a very remarkable manner, verified the discoveries of Halley and his successors. We are now on firm ground, on the brink of the unknown, hoping for good results from unremitting observations.

HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF POLITICS.

Mr. Frederick Pollock, M.A., LL.D., began his third lecture, given on Saturday last, with further remarks on the absolutist doctrines propounded by Hobbes; and then commented on the opinions of the English theorists of the next generation of these works. Locke's "Treatise on Civil Government" was really a political apology for the revolution of 1688. The Divine right of kings had to be confuted, though it only dated from the time of James I. His way had been prepared by Hooker. He assumed political society to be founded to preserve property originally created by man's labour. Each member resigns his natural power as far as is needful for that purpose. Locke held that absolute monarchy is not civil society at all. The sovereignty of the State is limited to the purposes of incorporation, and the preservation of lives, liberties, and estates. The dissolution of Government is the dissolution of society. The Bill of Rights, the most important document since Magna Charta, faces the question of the positive legality of the revolution, and was accepted by William and Mary. Mr. Pollock then commented on Rousseau's doctrine, at once popular and dogmatic, of the "social contract," in which the individual surrenders himself entirely to "the sovereign people;" with unlimited power, yet subject to general law. A Government is subject to the people, which cannot govern directly. "The declaration of the rights of man" mainly emanated from Rousseau. After remarks on Blackstone's improvements on Locke's doctrines regarding the state of nature, the origin of sovereignty, and the powers of Parliament, remarks were made on Montesquieu, termed the father of the historical method, who collected and compared important facts as evidence, and had enlightened views respecting English institutions. The lecture concluded with remarks upon Burke, who, in his abhorrence of the French Revolution, demonstrated the errors of the social contract, but did not propound any idea of a political system.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

THIRD NOTICE.

Still following the order of the catalogue (but with the intention of reserving some works for future notice), we reach the very remarkable battle-piece, by R. C. Woodville, "Maiden: Saving the Guns" (567). It is well that our disasters should be put before us, as well as our triumphs. Besides, more true courage is often displayed in the retreat than in the onslaught; and the gallant manner in which our guns were saved in that otherwise disgraceful discomfiture deserved commemoration. The spirit, or rather the fire and energy, the vivid conception, the skill in representing men and horses in every conceivable attitude, shown in this elaborate composition are surprising. The whole has an air of vérité that could scarcely have been surpassed had the young painter actually witnessed the scene. In this respect he approaches nearer to De Neuville than any other English artist. With commendation of "The Slain Enemy" (578), a well-painted picture by Heywood Hardy, we pause at H. Motte's very ingenious "Geese of the Capitol" (582), with the assailants mounted, acrobat fashion, on each other's shoulders in three tiers, in their attempt to scale the walls of the Capitol—a work that had already figured at the Salon. John Faed's picture (594) of a poet sleeping while the sky is peopled with the creations of his "dream" is—not the less that the whole is rendered with infinite pains—one of those semi-realistic semi-supernatural subjects which rarely touch the imagination. We would mention here, with an apology for having omitted it before, Mr. Thomas Faed's "There's a Little Lady! On with her Cloak!" (241), in the great room—a humble Scotch interior subject, distinguished by much of his well-known ability. "The Banquet" (609), by J. D. Linton, is the best of the series of six pictures illustrating the fortunes of a soldier of the sixteenth century hitherto exhibited. The tables are spread before a screen wall hung with garlands; the Prince and Princess sit under a canopy, with the victor at their side; and the dignitaries of the State and guests are ranged in order; the musicians are to the left, and a dancing-girl is in front. The banquet is al fresco, in the manner of Paul Veronese; and the painter has happily avoided the blackness of preceding works. Each face is a complete study of character, and the colouring is artistic in no mean degree. The composition, however, is a little stiff, and the figures seem to lack some connecting links of gesture and expression; yet this is one of the most considerable pictorial achievements of the year. "The Favourite, 1566" (628), by Seymour Lucas, is also a great advance. If we miss some of the refinement of the last-named work, the equable fulness of the colouring, the strength of the effect, the unlaboured execution, and the intelligent telling of the story, form an acceptable substitute. The "favourite" is Leicester, clad in white satin doublet and trunk hose, who, with dubious expression, is descending steps, after an audience with the Queen, conducting to an antechamber, where a group of courtiers eye him askance with varied expressions of envy and hatred. "Prince Edward VI. and his Whipping Boy" (649) is a promising picture by W. S. Stacey—a name new to us.

Entering the next room, the picture that first arrests attention is J. Griffiths' "Ayanta Caves, A.D. 600," which, at least, has the recommendation of novelty of subject. "The Last of his Race" (676), by C. Calthrop—a noble ruminating in a mediæval interior, with parchment deeds strewn the parquetry floor, is as well painted but will hardly be as popular as his "Here they are!" (129)—a couple of gay bachelors in costumes of the last century finding their chères amies in a seat in Hampton Court Palace Gardens. "Homeward" (682), a rocky torrent bed with a girl carrying a lamb to the fording place, is one of Mr. Herkomer's many powerful works of the year, which, perhaps, present their climax in the portrait of Mr. Archibald Forbes, the war correspondent, in the next room (787). "Merry as the Day is Long" (711) and another picture of rustic life, by F. Morgan, only want a little qualification of their too positive colouring, and too equal impasto, to be excellent of their kind. "Distance" can scarcely be said to "lend enchantment to the view," in K. Halswelle's "Three Counties, from Wetham Hill, Petersfield" (722). The scene is striking, and the execution skilful, but the whole is hard, and the distance lacks aerial perspective. Mr. Crofts has another elaborate illustration of the Battle of Waterloo, the scene being this time "At the Farm of Mont St. Jean," with the wounded in the foreground, artillery, Guards, and Highlanders advancing, or held in reserve, and Wellington and his staff on the crest of the hill in the middle distance. Examined in detail, there is much to commend; the groups and figures are well studied and appropriate; but the composition requires concentration or connection. "In the Evening there shall be Light" (737) is the title of a large and fine landscape by Mr. Leader, representing a flood of yellow light from a half-cleared sky just after sundown irradiating the scene and gilding the tombs of a churchyard in the foreground.

Passing into the next room, the first work of importance is "A Messenger of Good Tidings: News of Relief to Florence in 1496," in illustration of "Romola" (767), by F. W. W. Topham. It is a capable and good realisation of the subject; but the expressions, as in some previous works, seem constrained and peculiar. "Music o'er the Water" (773), an old Scotchman playing a fiddle in a boat, by Hamilton Macallum, is noticeable chiefly for the admirable rendering of sunlight on the thousand twinkling wavelets of the sea. "The Happy Valley" (779), a large landscape by F. Walton, has considerable merit, but is somewhat monotonous and vapid. The portrait of Sir Stafford Northcote (780), by Mr. Long, can scarcely be considered happy; evidently the painter is in technicalities not at his best this year. Mr. Gow, in No. 786, represents a number of Jacobites in pink, assembled, under pretext of hunting, in a secluded hollow to hear a Stuart "Proclamation" read. The grouping is capital; but why does the painter select such ill-favoured types? In this instance, there is hardly a gentleman among the lot. "The Wounded Stag" (793), by C. E. Johnson, is a large and telling, but essentially common-place, landscape. The vista of the north rooms is closed by Sir John Gilbert's "Fight for the Standard" (813)—a mass of men and horses, with the customary picturesque costumes, accoutrements, and trappings struggling in inextricable confusion. We much prefer, however, as a composition, more especially for its colouring, Sir John's "Crabbed age and youth cannot live together" (321)—a rustic dance and merry-making, from which an aged crone is limping away sad and lonely. Mr. Eyre Crowe has lighted on a capital subject in "The Defence of London in 1643" (840) by the Parliamentary forces; but what has happened to the painter that he should conceive our ancestors to have been such hideous, ill-made mannikins as he has depicted them, and that he should restrict his palette to hues so leaden, opaque, and inartistic? There is nothing in the exhibition more skilful in all manipulative qualities, more brilliant in colour, or more fertile in resource and clever in working out the theme than "The Queen of the Revels" (882), by the Florentine painter F. Vineca. The scene is an inn, with a large party of roystering troopers, in costumes of the seventeenth century, who have elevated a serving-girl to the top of a huge wine vat, surrounded by empty jaschi, and are toasting her to sound of clarion and beat of drum, amid infinite jest and merriment. We may regret that so much talent should be expended on such a subject, but there is no denying that in the trained ability here displayed our own painters of genre are woefully deficient. We may pretend to depreciate the value of technical expression; but without it no subject, however well conceived, however good in indicated intention, can take high rank as art. Mr. Charlton's picture of a pack of hounds on "A Hot Scent" (853) is a spirited piece of animal-painting.

In Room XI., the last containing oil-paintings, we come upon two more works by H. W. B. Davis—"Broken Weather in the Highlands" (1457) and "Showers in June" (1463)—but they call for no further praise than has already been given to the painter's "In Ross-shire." Close observation, careful completeness, thorough draughtsmanship and modelling of the animals, and more than usual richness of colour will be found in all. Yet all have a certain "tightness," as artist's say, or finality, and scarcely rise above the prosaic in art. The portrait of the late Charles Darwin (1465), by J. Collier, is one of the best in the exhibition, and should have had a place on the "line." It is full of character, yet unforced, unmannered, and unconventional. A portrait of Professor Monier Williams (1498), by W. W. Oulless, is also excellent, and one of the artist's best works. "Siesta in a Mosque" (1499), by T. Ralli, comes near Gérôme in its delicate precision. Exigences of space restrict us to simple mention of J. W. Waterhouse's "Diogenes" (1515); Colin Hunter's "Waiting for the Homeward Bound" (1520), in which, effective as it is, the tendency to paintiness is again perceptible; and "Buying and Selling on the Rialto" (1530), by W. Logsdail, in which, as in others here, the artist is slowly adding something of Italian colouring to the powerful but rather sombre realism he acquired in the Antwerp school.

Some pictures, especially those by known artists, not yet reviewed, together with the sculpture, drawings, &c., we must reserve for future notice.

NEW BOOKS.

Scholars, as it is the fashion to term certain persons who are believed to be familiarly conversant with the dead languages, will be delighted with Bentley: by R. C. Jebb, M.A., LL.D. Edin. (Macmillan and Co.), a volume of the very useful, interesting, and, it is to be hoped, popular "English Men of Letters;" but it is not unlikely that the ordinary English reader will wonder inwardly what right the great critic of Latin and Greek has to be included among the stars of English literature, and may be inclined, accordingly, to pass the book by or regard it with lukewarm feelings. This would be a great pity, however excusable it might be. For, although Bentley may have contributed little or nothing to purely English literature beyond his "Boyle Lectures" and his deplorable edition of "Paradise Lost," the story of his life is well worth reading, and the labours he achieved in the field of classical criticism were assuredly not without results which affected more or less nearly the estimate formed, both at home and abroad, of the position attained by English men of letters, and which gave rise to discussions concerning the English language itself. When it is once granted that Richard Bentley, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, in spite of a sentence of deprivation, for about forty-two years, is properly admitted into the category in which he has found a place, the question arises to whom the task of depicting him and his work would have been most fittingly confided; and echo, with a singular disregard of the usual practice observed by echoes, answers "Jebb," the very gentleman, fortunately, who has undertaken the subject. Let readers, therefore, attack the volume in the full assurance that they will find in it a biographical and critical dissertation of a very high order, such as might be expected from a most accomplished scholar, who would be sure to treat the memory of Bentley in an appreciative and even sympathetic spirit. Not indeed that all accomplished scholars can be trusted to free their minds of prejudice, for there was once a great Greek scholar, celebrated as the most successful "coach" at one of our chief Universities, who invariably omitted Bentley from the list of worthies produced by Cambridge. "Bentley," he would say with a sigh and a shake of the head, when he was reminded of the omission, "was certainly a perfect giant, but I always ignore him because he adulterated the beer at Trinity." This charge of adulteration is not discussed by Professor Jebb, but the masterful way in which Bentley dealt with the college is handled with sufficient thoroughness.

Desultory reading, sometimes of an agreeable as well as interesting and instructive kind, is provided in the two volumes entitled Recreations of a Literary Man: by Percy Fitzgerald (Chatto and Windus), though the title may excite an expectation of something very different from the entertainment afforded. The author's reminiscences of Charles Dickens, which, by the ingenious use of correspondence wherein the great humourist and others connected with him by various ties are more or less conspicuously concerned, are made to extend over many pages, form, perhaps, the most attractive portions of the two volumes. Next to them, in point of attractiveness, may be placed a description of the huge reading-room at the British Museum and a discussion of certain questions appertaining thereto. Then there are some very amusing and even touching stories about dogs which have from time to time belonged to the author. But there is very little indeed of such discourse as the title of the book would lead an ingenuous reader to anticipate. In fact, it is doubtful, to judge from the contents of the two volumes and from the sub-title, which is "Does Writing Pay?" whether the author's ideas of recreation include anything that does not bring grist to the mill or that entails any sort of personal expenditure. His revelations as regards "bookmaking" and the artifices whereby a literary man can make his vocation profitable are almost astounding. It is quite clear that such a literary man as the author has in his mind must never for a moment lose sight of the main chance, but must conduct himself continually in the spirit of a born "bag-man." There is something almost cynical in the candour with which the author expounds his method of proceeding, whence, it is to be presumed from his tone and from his figures, he has sucked out no mean advantage, has found a way, indeed, to make writing "pay." Of course the literary man who would succeed as he has apparently succeeded, in a pecuniary point of view, must have talent, as he certainly has, and must employ it, as he certainly has employed it, as if it were leather or any other article of merchandise. It seems that the best way to begin is to look out for some eminent literary personage, who is known to be engaged upon some work in which research is required, to send him gratuitously a carefully prepared collection of facts and notes and what not, which cannot fail to be useful to him, and so obtain from him an influential recommendation, which will at once establish you in the good graces of some editor conducting a flourishing periodical. If you should be so fortunate as to render assistance to a "harbinger cove," such as the cabman considered the late Mr. John Forster, who "was a man not to be trifled with," and who would request that his young friend's manuscript should "be seen to at once and set up in type" in the most popular periodical of the day, you may consider that you are well started on the road towards a moderate competency, at least, if you have our author's views as well as abilities. What those views are may be gathered from a few of his "confessions," as Rousseau might have called them. "I have travelled a great deal," says he, "but never at my own cost: rather to exceeding profit." This was managed, of course, by turning the trips to account, either on previous agreement or by a subsequent lucky venture, for a series of articles. Again he says, explaining an "original device," of which he is evidently proud: "On this principle I lately issued a three-volume novel which was itself a continuous story, and yet was composed of all the short humorous stories I had written during the past dozen years." To proceed deliberately in this fashion is certainly ingenious, but it is not literature: "it is magnificent, but it is not war." One can hardly conceive that we should have had so many great writers of fiction, if they had all adopted this "original device." Once more, he says, speaking of the advantages a "moderately successful author" possesses: "In nine cases out of ten, application to any of the London managers secures you a gratuitous stall. For years I have been a constant playgoer on these easy terms. So that now, when on a rare occasion I have to pay for a stall, it seems to border on a cruel imposition, as though the money had been taken from me unfairly. Such is the force of habit," a habit, some of us may think, "more honoured in the breach than in the observance." However, the author will sometimes gladly do literary work, if he likes it, at a loss, and therein he shows the true man of letters. He evidently thinks, and indeed says, that, without introductions, it is next to impossible to make writing "pay," with very rare exceptions; and he is probably quite right. For himself, he has done well as a novelist, a dramatist, an article-writer, and a "book-maker;" and of his work in the last capacity the two volumes under consideration are a fair example. Let it be acknowledged, in conclusion, that they are furnished with an index.

Tunis is a name which cannot be pronounced without waking a long train of thought, and carrying the mind back to a past, dim, certainly, with the dust of ages, but vivid with many records of its past glories and struggles. Fragile no doubt some of the written records are, and perplexing some of the architectural remains; but they are, nevertheless, the evidences that there has been a substantial past. The lately-published Tunis, the Land and the People, by the Chevalier de Warteg (Chatto and Windus), does not, however, deal with the interests of bygone generations, which generations are no doubt, to many readers of to-day, mingled in one confused mass; nor does the author dwell on the archaeological curiosities, as the latter, he says, "have been repeatedly described,"—indeed, better described than excavated; but the book relates to the present condition of Tunis, its towns, districts, and people, and cannot be too highly commended, for the interesting details given in a thoroughly concise and intelligent manner. In the more modern houses are to be found marble monoliths with splendid capitals, Roman stones with inscriptions and sculptures, parts of columns, evidently taken from Carthage, which was such a fruitful field to the Tunisians that, in the words of the author, "if Tunis were to be destroyed, her ruins would be the ruins of Carthage." There are, however, to be remarked a number of modern ruins of palaces, masterpieces of art; and still newer buildings in which the French style predominates in an obtrusive and unpleasant way; and this curious sight is due to a strange custom prevailing in Tunis—namely, that no reigning Bey lives in a palace where a former Bey has died, and as no Bey has preferred the patriotic but disagreeable alternative of being carried into the streets to die, there are more than a dozen palaces in Tunis to-day which cannot be used. Religious intolerance is a striking characteristic of the Tunisians. One instance showing this strongly is given by the author. A German lady, while sketching a group of houses, received the painful baptism of the contents of a bottle of vitriol thrown over her by a fanatic who laboured under the impression she was drawing a mosque. The chapter devoted to the Tunisian Army and Navy throws a great deal of light on the non-preparation of future soldiers and the general mismanagement and neglect of measures for the defence of the country. The poverty of the officers and soldiers is great, and may be imagined from the fact that the Chevalier's doucous of three francs to a major of infantry was received with gratitude, and the dragoman had suggested his giving even a smaller sum. The sentry on duty carried a broom-handle with a bayonet fixed on the top, and, being unable to present arms with it, he simply laid it aside and put his hand to his fez in order to salute. All this is strange to British ideas. The state of the Navy is a further shock; for a third of a page suffices for an ample statement of its force, efficiency, and combative properties. The monotony of so-called society amongst Orientals is very graphically detailed; and, in pleasing contrast to this monotony, comes the description of public life in the bazaars, which "can be contemplated for hours without fatigue or flagging interest;" and in these bazaars is to be seen all that ever is seen of the life of Tunisian women. So strict is the seclusion of the females that the Chevalier was obliged to found his sketch of their dress, occupations, and life in the harem on the observations of a lady friend, and the only vision of Oriental beauty which he came across was that of apparently decrepit old women, to which type all Moorish womanhood is reduced by their being so strictly veiled and enveloped in shawls that the tips of their fingers are scarcely visible. It is hardly necessary to touch on the many other points of interest in this publication, which cannot fail to win the good opinion of intelligent readers; but it is impossible to conclude without mentioning the chapters which relate to the Jews and their customs, to the great watering-place Goletta, with which is associated the story of Dido; for is not the modern seaside place built on part of the piece of land of world-wide notoriety which she bought? Nor is that part of the book less interesting which relates more directly to provincial life and mannerisms.

Lady Frances Evelyn Bertie, daughter of Lord Abingdon, took the black veil last week at the Convent of the Visitation of the Holy Mary, at Westbury-on-Trym, Gloucestershire, in the presence of numerous relatives, including Lord Norreys.

There was a meeting of the members of the Reform Club on Thursday week to discuss the existing method of electing members. A motion, proposed by Lord Hartington, and strongly supported by Mr. Bright and Lord Granville, declaring it desirable to place the election of members in the hands of a committee in place of being by ballot of the whole club was carried, on a show of hands, but was eventually referred to a ballot.

MEN OF LETTERS.

Imitation is not only the sincerest flattery but very often the best proof that a certain venture has been successful; and we may conclude, therefore, it is to be hoped, that the success of "Ancient Classics for English Readers" and of "English Men of Letters" fully accounts for the publication not only of the series commenced some time ago under the style and title of "Foreign Classics for English Readers," but also of the more recent series entitled "American Men of Letters."

A wonderfully interesting little volume is Schiller: by James Sime, M.A. (William Blackwood and Sons), in which there is such an account of the poet who holds the next rank to Goethe in the great German host of singers, together with specimens of his compositions in various lines, as well completely meet the requirements, rejoice the heart, and enlighten the mind of the ordinary reader, though the enthusiast and the student may have to seek elsewhere for greater detail and more elaborate criticism. What the conditions of space made it possible to do has apparently been done to a marvel; indeed, it may be said that the performance surpasses what could be reasonably expected from the opportunities. What Goethe and Heine said of Schiller is told in a few introductory pages, in which information is also given as to the biographical resources to be drawn upon by readers who may thirst for further knowledge; and then the main business is attacked. One would like, of course, to believe that he was descended from a certain Schiller, "who in the early part of the fifteenth century was famous as a Master Singer in South Germany;" but the probability is weakened rather than strengthened by the fact that he seems to have owed the possession of his poetic faculty, so far as it was hereditary, to his mother and not to his father, although, to be sure, his paternal and maternal ancestry may have intermarried over and over again in the space of two or three centuries. However, it is more to the point to observe that the spirit of poesy, and a double portion of it, whence-soever it came, was plainly manifested in him; and how the manifestation began and culminated, in spite of early and later obstacles, may be most agreeably collected from the little volume under consideration.

Exceedingly pleasant reading, combined with an exposition of some things not generally known, is contained in La Fontaine, etc.: by the Rev. W. Lucas Collins, M.A. (William Blackwood and Sons), a particularly welcome volume of the "Foreign Classics for English Readers," as it treats not only of La Fontaine, who must be known by name if not by translation, even to persons who abjure all language save "plain English," but also briefly, far too briefly, as the reader may think, of "other French fabulists," whose very existence has never been heard of by a very large minority, if not by the majority, among us. De la Motte we know, and Florian, so-styled, we know; at least some of us know them a little; but who is acquainted, not to say familiar, with Richer, Desbillons, Aubert, Le Monnier, and Le Bailly? Yet they are the "other French fabulists," as to whom, had space permitted, it would have been satisfactory to have a great deal more both of biographical detail and illustrative quotation. La Fontaine and his works, however, occupy, naturally and worthily, nearly the whole number of pages, and very fascinating are the pages devoted to him and his fables. He was a literary character, and indeed a human character, such as is almost incomprehensible in the present day, when even a poet is expected to attend to some of the conventional rules of life, as well as to understand and practise the elementary procedure of business, and when he not unfrequently exhibits more keenness than was either expected or desired in affairs of pounds, shillings, and pence. La Fontaine, however, would probably have given "Jemmy" Thompson points and beaten him in a bout of indolence; he was a Simple Simon in all matters of business; he left other people to take care of him (which, strange to say, they did), and his way of fulfilling his duties as a husband and a father would have disgraced the wildest animal in his own fables. To say that he had lax notions of morality would be a very complimentary modification of the truth; he wrote "tales" so licentious that they were "branded by a police censure," and he was so simple as to plead in his defence that they "had never done him any harm." His fables, however, were pure and blameless, and obtained for him the generous eulogy of good Archbishop Fénelon, though Boileau refused to recognise them as poetry. Such as he was, everybody seems to have loved him; and certainly an account, however short, of his long life is "as good as a play." The "bon homme" still exercises the same strange spell that belonged to him in his lifetime.

Among "American Men of Letters" none is remembered among us more affectionately, so to speak, than he who is the subject of the volume entitled Washington Irving: by Charles Dudley Warner (Sampson Low and Co.); and, if "for fifty years Irving charmed and instructed the American people," the same remark might be applied, with some necessary modification, to the effect produced in this country by his writings. "You have made me weep," said the great Mrs. Siddons to him on two separate occasions in the "tragedy voice" which disconcerted the susceptible author; and he, in his day, affected to tears and to laughter many countrywomen, and probably countrymen, of the queenly actress. Why Washington Irving should be less read, if not altogether neglected, both on this and on the other side of the Atlantic, at the present day is a question impossible to be decided off-hand; but he is by no means the only illustrious author who has met with such a fate, and one easy and obvious explanation is supplied by the incontrovertible fact that, as the great multitude of authors increases, and as the newer writers naturally attract the greater attention, a few only of the older writers—the human capacity for reading being limited by many causes—can hold their own among and perhaps above the new comers; and it is probably accident that decides, in most cases, who those few shall be. However, on this point, as well as on other more or less important and interesting points, it will be worth while to consult the little volume consecrated to the memory of Washington Irving.

Patience, perseverance, patriotism, unbounded self-confidence, pushed to the verge of self-conceit, and the acquisition and application of a certain curious erudition under disheartening circumstances, are illustrated by the career depicted in Noah Webster: by Horace E. Scudder (Sampson Low and Co.), the career of a very remarkable man, whom it would be more unjust to exclude from the ranks of "American Men of Letters" than it seems improper to include therein. For it is scarcely too much to say that, though he wrote a great deal, he would never have been remembered by his writings, and that he owes his fame, his imperishable fame, such as it is, to the compilation of the dictionary which bears his name, and which, by the exertions of subsequent editors, has been transformed into a truly great and almost universally respected work, wherever the English language is spoken, instead of remaining, as it would have remained, a monument, grotesque rather than great, of enormous labour, inordinate vanity, unsound learning, unphilosophical method, and appalling iconoclasm. Noah Webster, moreover, is an instance, probably a solitary instance, of a man who lived and brought up a family for years on the proceeds of a spelling-book, and a spelling-book, too, whereof the orthography would make an ordinary Englishman's hair stand on end; but, again, it is a question whether "men of letters" comprise the worshipping company of spelling-book manufacturers. However that may be, there will be few readers to whom "Noah Webster" will not reveal a resolute character and an honourable life with which they will feel the better for becoming acquainted.

Charles Lamb, by Alfred Ainger (Macmillan), will be welcome to many readers, there being few names dearer to the lover of fine literature than that of Lamb. We do not say that the book is wholly satisfactory. The portrait of Lamb cannot be painted on a small scale. His genius was eminently discursive; and the enduring noble tragedy of his life needs to be written at large. Some authors exist apart from their works: Lamb's life is bound up in his, and it may be read best, perhaps, in his essays and letters, since it is only by the help of a variety of touches that we can understand his sweet but contradictory nature. The biographer is cramped for space, and apparently feels it. He knows his subject well, however, and, as far as it is possible to do so, looks at it from different points of view. There is no story sadder in our literature than that of Charles and Mary Lamb, but its painfulness, like that of a great drama, is relieved by the heroic character of the sufferers. The characters of the brother and sister were by no means flawless. Charles, it is well known, had a predilection for gin-and-water, and Mary took snuff. They lived like Bohemians, in a rough sort of way that some refined and aesthetic people could not tolerate. What talk, however, there must have been at those Wednesday evening gatherings in Inner Temple-lane, or in Russell-street, Covent-garden, where Lamb was at his ease, and surrounded by men whom he loved and who loved him! And what friends this clerk at the India House had! His best and dearest, perhaps, was Coleridge; but Wordsworth and Southey loved him well, and Procter, Talfourd, and Hazlitt laughed at his puns, joined in lively criticism of books and men, and no doubt relished the homely meal of cold meat and porter, with "something hot" afterwards, prepared for them by Miss Lamb in those bachelor-like rooms. Lamb only showed his real character to friends like these; and it is admitted that the first impression he made on ordinary people was always unfavourable, "sometimes to a violent and repulsive degree." People who were not ordinary could be also repelled; and Carlyle, himself a great humorist, found Lamb's talk "contemptibly small." "It is only too probable," says Mr. Ainger, "that the presence of the austere and dyspeptic Scotchman (one of that nation Lamb had been trying all his life to like) made him more than usually disposed to produce his entire stock of frivolity. He had a perverse delight in shocking uncongenial society." After all, no one has better portrayed the contrarieties of Lamb's character than the essayist himself, in the preface to the second series of the Essays of Elia. Mr. Ainger's criticism strikes us as admirable. The richness and variety of Lamb's style and its fitness for every theme he touches are noticeable features of the writer's genius. The style is the man, and "it is the man Charles Lamb that constitutes the enduring charm of his written words. The biographer calls him also a poet; and so, in a certain sense, he is; but though Lamb wrote a few lovely verses—witness the lines on Hester—it would be more correct to say that he viewed everything in a poetical light. His humour in this respect shows a marked contrast to that of Sydney Smith. It has about it too subtle a flavour to be appreciated at the dinner-table. De Quincey has said that Lamb's admirers must always be a select few. We do not think this is true—in the sense that it is true, for instance, of Elia's prime favourite, Sir Thomas Browne; and if he does not win universal admiration like Shakespeare and Scott, he will, we believe, gain instead of losing friends as the years roll on. We trust that Mr. Ainger's interesting little volume may contribute to this good end. It deserves to do so, for it is not only a sound piece of literary workmanship, but it is written in a sympathetic and liberal spirit. Some readers will think, perhaps, that the author deals too gently with the frailties of his hero.

Lord Carlingford has allowed the tenantry on his Somersetshire estate $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the rent of the hill farms and 5 per cent on the rent of richer grass lands. The abatements of the two previous years were 15 and 10 per cent respectively.

Another mysterious disappearance is reported from West Ham—that of an old maiden lady, named Sophia Marsh. She was of somewhat eccentric habits, but in comfortable circumstances. On the 12th ult. she received from her solicitors £192 in dividends, and on that day went into Stratford, since which time she has not been seen, nor have the police been able to discover anything of her.—The amount of the reward offered for the discovery of the two little girls who so mysteriously disappeared at West Ham has been raised to £200, one half of which will be paid on information regarding either of them.

OLD INNS OF COURT CUSTOMS.

The history of the Inns of Court in days gone by, apart from its legal interest, affords us a good insight into the festive and social life of our forefathers. Indeed, the merry doings associated with these old institutions are proverbial, and many a graphic picture has been bequeathed to us illustrative of the joviality which once formed a prominent characteristic on all seasons of rejoicing. Thus, it may be remembered that in the hall of the Middle Temple was performed Shakspeare's "Twelfth Night," a fact recorded in the table-book of John Manningham, a student of the Middle Temple:—"Feb. 2, 1601-2.—At our feast we had a play called 'Twelfth Night; or What You Will.'" As Charles Knight remarks in his "Pictorial Shakspeare," "it is yet pleasant to know that there is one locality remaining where a play of Shakspeare was listened to by his contemporaries, and that play 'Twelfth Night.'" We read, too, how, in the reign of Charles I., the students of the Middle Temple were accustomed at All Hallow-tide, which they considered the beginning of Christmas, to prepare for the festive season; an account of which we find in Whitelocke's "Memoirs of Bulstrode Whitelocke." Evelyn alludes to the Middle Temple feasts, and describes that of 1688 as "very extravagant and great, as the like had not been seen at any time." Equally famous were the entertainments at the Inner Temple—Christmas, Candlemas, Ascension Day, and Hallowe'en having been observed with great splendour. In 1561 the Christmas revels were kept on a very splendid scale. At breakfast, brawn, mustard, and malmsey were served; and at the dinner in the hall several imposing ceremonies were gone through. Thus it is related how, between the two courses, first came the master of the game, then the ranger of the forests, who, having blown three blasts of the hunting-horn, paced three times round the fire, then in the middle of the hall. Nine or ten couple of hounds were then brought in, with a fox and a cat, which were set upon by the dogs, amidst the blowing of horns. At the close of the second course the oldest of the masters of the revels sang a song. Finally, after supper, the Lord of Misrule addressed himself to the banquet, which, amongst other diversities, generally concluded with minstrelsy and dancing.

Many of the dinner customs of the Inns of Court are curious. Thus a banquet at the Inner Temple is a grand affair. At five, or half-past five, the barristers and students in their gowns follow the Benchers in procession to the dais; the steward strikes the table three times, grace is said by the treasurer or senior bench present, and dinner commences. The waiters are called "panniers," from the "panarii" who attended the Knight Templars; and in former years it was the custom to blow a horn in every court to announce the meal. The loving cups used on important occasions are huge silver bowls, which are passed down the table filled with the time-honoured "sack," which consists of "sweetened and exquisitely-flavoured white wine;" each student being restricted to a "sip." On May 29 a gold cup of this fragrant beverage is handed to each member, who drinks to the happy restoration of Charles II.

Referring to the customs once observed at the Middle Temple banquets, many of these have died out. "The loving cup," Mr. Thornbury remarks, in "Old and New London" (I. 179), "once fragrant with sweetened sack, is now used to hold the almost superfluous toothpicks. Oysters are no longer brought in, in Term, every Friday before dinner; nor when one Benchers dines does he, on leaving the hall, invite the senior bar-man to come and take wine with him in the Parliament Chamber (the accommodation-room of Oxford Colleges)." Dugdale informs us that "until the second year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, this society did use to drink in cups of aspen-wood; but then those were laid aside, and green earthen pots introduced, which have ever since been continued." Amongst the old customs associated with the Middle Temple may be mentioned the calves'-head breakfast which was given by the chief cook of the society to the whole fraternity, for which every member paid at least one shilling. In the eleventh year of James I., however, this breakfast was turned into a dinner, and appointed to be held on the first and second Monday in every Easter Term. The price per head was regularly fixed, and to be paid by the whole society, as well absent as present, and the sum thus collected was divided amongst all the domestics of the house.

The merry doings at Lincoln's Inn were, in days gone by, kept up with much enthusiasm; and frequent notices of the "Revels" are given by our old writers. Charles Knight, too, in his "Cyclopædia of London," tells us that on such occasions dancing and singing were insisted on, and, by an order of Feb. 6, in the 7th James I., it appears that "the under-barristers were by decimation put out of commons for example's sake, because the whole bar were offended by their not dancing on the Candlemas Day preceding, according to the ancient order of the society, when the Judges were present." Of the social customs formerly observed, we read that at each mess it was a rule that there should be a "moot daily;"—the junior member of each mess having to propound to the rest at his table some knotty question of law, which was discussed by each in turn during the dinner. Not many years ago, too, it was the custom for one of the servants, attired in his usual robes, to go to the threshold of the outer door about twelve or one o'clock, and call out three times, "Venez manger." To quote a further old custom, in the first year of Elizabeth, it was ordered "that no Fellow of the house should wear a beard of above a fortnight's growth, under penalty of loss of commons, and, in case of obstinacy, of final expulsion."

Gray's Inn, again, formerly had its masques and revels, when the presentation of plays seems to have been one of the chief features. A comedy, acted at Christmas, 1527, written by John Roos, a student of the inn, so offended Wolsey, that its author was actually imprisoned. Amongst the many customs relating to the dining-hall, we are told that in 1581 an agreement was made regarding Easter, in accordance with which the members who came to breakfast after service and communion were to have "eggs and green sauce" at the expense of the House, and that "no calves' heads were to be provided by the cook." In the year 1600 the members were instructed not to come into the hall with their hats, boots, or spurs; but with their caps, decently and orderly, "according to the ancient orders." Gray's Inn has also been noted for its exercises known as "Bolting," which is thus defined in Cowell's "Law Dictionary":—"Bolting is a term of art used in Gray's Inn, and applied to the bolting or arguing of moot cases."

Lastly, a very curious dinner custom has in years gone by been kept up at Clifford's Inn. The society consists of two distinct bodies—"the Principal and Rules," and the junior members, or "Kentish Mess." Each body has its own table. At the conclusion of the dinner, the chairman of the Kentish mess, first bowing to the Principal of the Inn, takes from the hand of the servitor some small rolls or loaves of bread, and, without saying a word, he dashes them three several times on the table; he then discharges them to the other end of the table, from whence the bread is removed by a servant in attendance. Solemn silence—broken only by three impressive thumps upon the table—prevails during this ceremony.

POETRY.

Baby-worship has seldom, if ever, found purer and at the same time quainter expression than is given to it in My Boy and I; or, On the Road to Slumberland: by Mary D. Brine, which is, apparently, an American publication, to be obtained in this country from Messrs. Trübner and Co. A book it is, no doubt, but a book of a very curious sort, as regards material, external form, and sundry adjuncts. Conceive a quantity of leaves, about threescore in number, oblong in shape, about a foot long and about half a foot broad, made of some unusually thick paper, tinted yellowish, suggestive of vellum; conceive, further, that this collection of leaves, inclosed, sandwich-like, between two covers of limp brown leather, or quasi-leather, is fastened together at one end by an arrangement of greenish floss-silk passing through certain holes pierced in the covers and leaves; that the covers alone, overlapping the leaves, are similarly fastened at the other end, the silk being tied here in such fashion that it can be undone at will; and that the whole is incased, so as to be removed at pleasure, in the kind of box, whether made of cardboard or of something similar, in which haberdashers are wont to keep gloves, handkerchiefs, and other more or less useful articles. It must be acknowledged that quaint, not to say odd, is an epithet which may be well applied to such an aggregate. But that is not the sum of peculiarities; there is print of an archaic type, there is a series of pretty illustrations, and there are queer medallion-like stamps upon the covers and elsewhere. The poem, which is presented in this guise, and which is divided into twelve short parts, may be said to resolve itself into a description, very simple, very lifelike, full of pure, tender, maternal sentiment, of the way in which a well-to-do-mother, with a nurse at call and no hard work on hand, passes the whole of a summer-day with her baby-boy, whose father is supposed to be far away at sea. The various pictures will, no doubt, go home to every mother's heart, and they, some of them, if not all, are distinguished for happiness both of fancy and of touch; the verse is, for the most part, appropriate to the subject, and often tuneful withal, though the poetic flight may be more frequently a little below than a great deal above the height attained by the celebrated Dr. Watts. The writer insists, with almost exasperating iteration, upon the attribute of sweetness characteristic of the baby-boy, a sweetness, we are assured, beyond that of "any blossom fair"; and one is almost goaded into a statement of the other side of the question, as many weighty authorities have maintained that an inexplicable sourness is always exhaled by very young children. The writer, on the other hand, seems to be under no illusion as to the wretched life led by a dog or a cat under the baby-boy dispensation, but to regard it as the will of Providence and the natural condition of the lower animals: it might be well to take the opinion of a certain excellent Society which interferes for the protection of dumb creatures. However, there is little doubt that most mothers who read the poem will think that the dog and cat ought to consider themselves highly flattered to be tormented by the darling boy, and will be much touched and edified by the charming spectacle presented.

Two of the nine muses, Clio and Euterpe, have been invoked to inspire the contents of The Visions of England: by Francis T. Palgrave (Macmillan and Co.), unless, indeed, the author, after the fashion of Horace, may have called upon Calliope, whose proper sphere, according to the pundits, is the epic rather than the lyric division of poetry, to aid him. In other words, the learned author has undertaken to present his readers with a series of lyrical pieces, in each of which the theme is suggested by reminiscences of some historical personage or incident, or both, with whom or which the fortunes of this island have been associated from the days of Julius Caesar to the death of Albert the Good, and even to a later date. The author will probably be considered to attach undue importance to questions of metrical composition, and to have employed in several instances an elaborate and intricate form which, lacking the irresistible, torrent-like flow of the inimitable Pindaric ode, interferes with the reader's progress and withdraws attention from the picture to the frame, as it were. At the same time it must be admitted that a risk of monotony is run when a volume is made up of comparatively short lyrical poems, and there is little or no variety of structure; though it may be urged, on the other hand, that continuous perusal is by no means necessary or even to be recommended. However, the performance is, on the whole, very spirited and readable, and sometimes really beautiful; that it is full of scholarly graces is a matter of course. There are some very useful, helpful notes, and there is an explanatory, highly instructive appendix, which would have been none the worse for being considerably fuller. The "visions" may occasionally seem to have been seen by the author through a distorted or peculiarly-coloured medium, for all Englishmen do not take the same view of historical characters and events; but the volume will certainly afford everybody an excellent opportunity of renewing the pleasures of memory with the addition of gratification derived from a poetical version of historical subjects, and, should memory be faded or never have been exercised in that direction, no reader of the poems is likely to be satisfied until recourse has been had to the store from which the author has borrowed his material. And nobody presumably would be better pleased than the author if the publication of his volume should lead to a more general interest in English history.

Exuberance of language, composite phrases, elaboration of strange epithets, and a Gallic-like disregard of the laws which should regulate rhyme, are regrettably conspicuous in Songs of Study: by William Wilkins (C. Kegan Paul, and Co.), a collection of poems in which natural power is distinctly apparent whenever the writer's thoughts and feelings are allowed to have simple, unaffected utterance. Rhyme is, of course, a matter of relatively little consequence; but, as the adoption of rhyme is purely voluntary, there is the less excuse for treating it with a latitude beyond the limits of reasonable liberty, so that "beauty" shall be made to rhyme with "study," "hedges," with "catches," "arches" with "surges," "azure" with "vesture." But in the volume under consideration there are so many instances of such license that the eye and the ear are constantly offended and shocked, and doubts arise as to the author's possession of that musical instinct without which it is generally supposed that no true poet is born. It is impossible, however, to read the pieces entitled "Actæon" and "Ail Mavrish" without perceiving that he who could write them must have within him some spark of poetical inspiration, and that he has literary culture and a faculty of versification there is plenty of evidence, both intrinsic and extrinsic, for he is or was a scholar of Trinity College, Dublin, and some of his verses have been published at various times in various more or less notable publications. Still it is clear that a singer who, when he tunes up his lyre to sing of Diana and her nymphs disporting themselves in a limpid stream can include their "hums" in a description of their exquisite limbs, has scarcely sufficient delicacy of perception and has something to learn as to the choice of appropriate terms; while the exigencies of rhyme cannot very well be pleaded by a writer who allows himself so much freedom in that respect.

Occasional ruggedness, rather assumed than involuntary, one would be inclined to think, in the composition, and the occasional affectation of peculiarity in the metres and the system of rhymes, cannot prevent a reader of A Sculptor, and Other Poems: by E. H. Hickey (Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co.), from being impressed with the power and beauty exhibited in most of the compositions, of which some are written with an impetuosity that suggests sheer inspiration, and with a fiery vigour that verges upon fierceness, a fierceness quite appropriate to the subject. No theme seems to come amiss to the writer, who appears to be equally at home with the terrible and the gentle, with the wild madman and unbeliever, or with the loving, patient Christian saint and martyr. In the poem which is not injudiciously chosen for special mention in the title of the volume a terrible and yet most affecting story is told in powerful, nervous verse, whereof the frequent roughness is evidently studied, intentional, and as impressive as it is artistic. It is the story of a woman's love, unfulfilling but unappreciated, and of a man's high aim, seen with his mind's eye but beyond the attainment of his bodily powers; he could grasp a beautiful conception, but he could not give it expression in marble, and the mingled hopefulness and hopelessness of his condition is most pathetically set forth in the poem, in which the notes of anticipated triumph die away in a wail of blank despair. Very poetically, also, is it insinuated throughout the story that in the love which lay at the sculptor's command, and to which he was blind, or of which he was wilfully neglectful, lay the very charm he required to break the spell of executive incapacity, or at any rate to make ample amends for professional failure. And throughout the volume, whether in the original pieces or in the translations, there are outward and visible signs of the poet's spirit and fancy and touch.

The most ambitious composition in Poems: by Arthur Bridge, (Richard Bentley and Son), is a drama in five acts, entitled "Cromwell," in which there is some excellent blank verse, though the writer himself, to judge from the modest spirit exhibited in his introductory and dedicatory sonnet, would be the first to express a fear that the poetical treatment is somewhat deficient in the height, breadth, and strength required for so colossal a subject. Whether the play were intended for representation or not, can only be surmised; but there are certain scenes which would probably tax the resources of the management, to say nothing of the effect likely to be produced upon the spectators, as, for instance, when there "enter, escorted by soldiers, eight and thirty waggon-loads of silver on the way to the Tower," and when there is "discovered," to use the technical expression, "a gullows with Cromwell's body dangling," the moon being up, so that "white gleameth the gullows, white the skin-peeled bones, and white the teeth, and white the grinning skull" of "the late Protector." It is doubtful, too, whether the patience of an audience would hold out whilst the impersonator of Cromwell spoke a speech six pages long. Other poems, however, there are, not so many in number as the grains of sand upon the seashore, but exceedingly numerous as well as diverse, pretty, melodious, pathetic, imitative, quaint, regular and irregular; and out of them all it will be passing strange if most readers do not find something to their taste, though there may be nothing that will move the whole world.

Sufficient command of versification and sufficient power of description to make a "metrical romance" something more than readable are by no means uncommon in these days of general cultivation, but in Darroll and Other Poems: by Walter Cook Spens, advocate (Edinburgh: David Douglas), those necessary qualities are not only conspicuously present but united with others of a more exclusive kind. It is a pity, however, that more than one of the author's themes should belong to what may be called the adulterous category. There is something extremely repulsive in the picture, however well it may be painted, of an adulteress confessing her sin, which had never so much as been suspected, over her dead husband's corpse, lamenting that she had tended him with a false assumption of wifely affection, and indulging in a burst of hysterical, and most probably short-lived repentance. Nor was the adulterous episode at all necessary for the purposes of the "metrical romance," which might have been made quite as touching, natural, graceful, and far less common, without so hackneyed a resource.

Liberal measure is the foremost characteristic of The Collegians: by S. Lenox L. Bigger (Dublin: Hodges, Figgis, and Co.), for the bulk of the volume looms large upon the eye, and the titlepage reveals the fact that there is "a poem in fourteen cantos" to be encountered. This would be regarded as a somewhat formidable work to be attacked, even if the writer were a Lord Byron; and so much cannot be said in the author's favour, although he exhibits many of the qualities that distinguished the noble Lord both as a lover of adventure, a friend of the sea, and a writer of easy, and sometimes slipshod and careless, descriptive verse. But then the noble Lord sometimes soared upon the pinions of genius to heights unattainable by the ordinary verse-writer; and to those heights our author cannot aspire. The poem may be said to be a description in rhyme, with more or less rhythmical measures, of life and adventure, whereof the heroes-in-chief are two college-friends, of whom one is always favoured by fortune above the other, whether the object of their friendly rivalry be college distinction or lovely woman. There is a wholesome freshness, as of sea-breezes, about the poem, which is dedicated to "the yachtmen of Great Britain and Ireland," to whose appreciation, accordingly, it may be hereby commended.

A scholar, apparently, is the anonymous author of Bits of Life (Trübner and Co.); but that fact is to be gathered rather from his Greek quotations than from his English verses, whereof the grammar and the structure are scarcely up to the level of the rhymes ascribed to "Peter Pindar," and generally classified as doggerel. Set, however, in the doggerel, or attached to it, are some sonnets, so framed or arbitrarily so called, in which, for all the slovenliness and carelessness of mechanical construction, graceful fancy expresses itself in graceful terms. Two cousins, one of each sex, their aunt, and one or two other persons converse in rhyme upon all kinds of topics which are discussed at the present day, and the two cousins recite one to the other or write one to the other a few verses which have more or less claim to be considered poetry; and thus a volume of slight dimensions is filled with "bits of life"—that is, with descriptions or remarks founded upon certain phases of human existence.

A true child of the muse is proclaimed on nearly every page of Legends of the Heart: by Gerard Bendall (William Holmes), and it were rash to say positively whether the writer is happier in the dramatic or in the lyric vein. At any rate, the dramatic piece is a thing of grace, and the lyric pieces are full of vigour as well as of melody.

Some exquisite lines, delicate as well as striking in idea and in diction, will be found in Songs in the South: by Kennell Rodd (David Bogue), a volume simple, unpretensions, but elegant withal, the contents corresponding well with the characteristics of the exterior. These contents are, for the most part, coloured Roman, having been written, apparently, within the influence of the Coliseum and the Tiber. The correct ear, however, will protest against the violence which forces the last syllable of Lucciolà to rhyme with that of "alar," and with "star" and "are." But much must be conceded, no doubt, when consonance is required for a sound uncommon in English.

THE JEANNETTE SEARCH AND RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Our Special Artist, Mr. A. Larsen, accompanying Mr. Jackson, of the New York Herald, who was sent by the proprietor of that journal, Mr. James Gordon Bennett, to search for the survivors of the shipwrecked crew on the north-eastern coast of Siberia, has sent us the Sketches engraved for this Extra Supplement. Our readers will regret to learn this week, by a telegram, dated March 24, from Mr. Melville, the engineer of the Jeannette, who had returned from Yakutsk to the mouths of the Lena, endeavouring to save his forlorn comrades, that Lieutenant De Long, the commander of the vessel, and all the men who had remained with him, have been found dead, having perished of cold and hunger during last winter. Several other survivors of the Jeannette, Lieutenant Danenhauer, Mr. Newcombe, the naturalist, the Chinese steward, and a seaman named Cole, arrived at St. Petersburg last week, and took up their quarters at the house of the representative of the New York Herald. All these appear in good bodily health, but, unfortunately, the seaman Cole is completely out of his mind. At times he becomes almost unmanageable, and had to be kept from attacking Lieutenant Danenhauer and his comrades by the exertion of the Cossack who has accompanied the party all the way from Irkutsk. Lieutenant Danenhauer suffers from weakness of sight, and has to keep himself as much as possible in the dark. He hopes, however, that his sight will return, and that he will regain his usual strength as soon as he gets into warmer climes, and can receive the attention of a skilled oculist. The party have received the congratulations of the Russian Minister of the Navy, and the American Legation has given an entertainment in their honour.

The Sketches now presented to our readers were dispatched by our Special Artist from Irkutsk, in Central Siberia, on March 7, after he met Lieutenant Danenhauer on his way from the north-east, and from Yakutsk, to European Russia. Our Artist then obtained from Lieutenant Danenhauer, and from the naturalist, Mr. Newcombe, notes and sketches illustrating the voyage of the Jeannette to explore the seas and islands and continental shores of Northern Asia beyond Iching's Strait, and of the loss of that vessel, crushed by the ice on June 13, and the subsequent adventures of her officers and crew, who got ashore by their boats at the mouths or delta of the River Lena.

Shortly after the Jeannette went down, having been previously abandoned by the crew, they started through the ice on the retreat for land. The greatest hardships were to be gone through; but their spirits were excellent, and many were the jokes and laughs heard, even when danger was greatest, and when the exposure to severe cold with hunger and wet, and the necessity of exhausting work, aggravated the necessity of struggling for life.

In consequence of the stronger light at day-time, the men worked on during the night and slept at day, an arrangement that proved most fortunate, giving some relief at least to the toilers. They seldom made more than one or two miles a day, and during the first week they were in the highest latitude reached by the expedition—77 degrees north. On July 9 the island afterwards called Bennett Island was first seen at a distance, but it soon disappeared in the fog. On the 29th they reached this rocky barren island. After landing, the American ensign was planted, and the party remained there twelve days on American soil. This Bennett Island was the third discovered by the expedition; Jeannette and Henrietta Islands having already been discovered before the Jeannette went down. On Aug. 5 the exhausting voyage was continued; the New Siberian Islands were passed at the end of the month, and the parties started southwards to the mouth of the Lena river. During ten days and nights of September it blew a heavy gale; the boats shipped many seas, and the darkness of the night made the situation still more terrible. Their escape may be said to have been a miraculous one. There was much ice, and the boats were often struck by it, causing one of them, that of Melville and Danenhauer, to leak; it was hauled to a large piece of ice, where repairs were performed. As soon as the weather cleared up the course for the shore was taken up again, and this party landed in safety in the Lena mouth, but one of the boats, commanded by Mr. Chipps, first officer of the Jeannette, was lost at sea. We have still a large number of sketches in hand.

ROYAL NATIONAL LIFE-BOAT INSTITUTION.

At a meeting of this institution held on Thursday week at its house, John-street, Adelphi, rewards amounting to £150 were granted to the crews of life-boats for services rendered during the storms of the past month. The Harwich life-boat saved four men from the schooner Henrietta, of London; the Southwold No. 1 life-boat three men from the pilot-boat Ben and Louisa, belonging to that place; the Hauxley life-boat six men from the fishing smack Belle, of Blyth; the Arbroath life-boat six men from the brigantine Expedit, of Porsgrund; and the Bude life-boat saved the smack Bocomnoc and her crew of three men. During the violent gale experienced on Saturday last, the Freemasons' life-boat at Clacton—named, after the Prince of Wales, The Albert Edward—saved, with much difficulty, the crew of five men from the Norwegian sloop Nordstjerten; the Ferryside, Carmarthen Bay, life-boat landed two men from the stranded yacht Formosa, of Carmarthen, and the Hayle life-boat saved two men from the s.s. Drumhendry. Rewards were granted to the crews of shore-boats for saving life from wrecks on our coasts, and payments amounting to £1170 were made on life-boat establishments. A second contribution of £600 has been received from the readers of the Boys' Own Paper, through the editor, Mr. G. A. Hutchison, to defray the cost of their No. 2 Life-boat. The late Miss M. Joes, of Waterloo, Lancashire, bequeathed £1000 to the institution for a life-boat to be named A Daughter's Offering; and the late Mrs. A. G. Stamp, of Hull, £50. Reports were read from the five district inspectors of life-boats to the institution.

The subscribers to the Frank Buckland Memorial met at 34, Portland-place, last Saturday—Prince Christian in the chair. It was reported that £988 has been received; 150 guineas have been expended on a bust by Mr. Warrington Wood, which is to be placed at South Kensington; and with the remainder an annuity of £50 has been purchased for Mrs. Buckland. Prince Christian presented the bust to Sir P. Cunliffe Owen, who accepted it on behalf of the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 20, 1882.

A perilous, but not unforeseen, crisis has arisen in Egypt. The weakness of the Khedive some months ago, when a little moral courage would have availed much, plunged his country into political confusion; the firmness of his Highness now promises to bring Egypt back into the right path. It is not surprising that Ourabi Pasha, to whom Tewfik Pasha virtually capitulated in February last, has gone from one step to another supported by the officers of whose audacious claims he was the mouthpiece, until Egypt is threatened with a military despotism of the most odious character. His puppets, the Khedive's Ministers, were last week required to convene the Assembly of Notables with the avowed object of deposing their Sovereign. The Notables refused to obey a summons which was unconstitutional unless indorsed by the Khedive, and some of their leading men endeavoured to bring about a compromise. Tewfik, supported by the French and English Consuls-General, remained firm, and declined "to treat with rebels." The Cabinet, however, after some unsuccessful attempts had been made to modify it, remains for the present in power, public opinion—at least, Arab opinion—is highly favourable to the new course taken by the Khedive; and, still more important, the army reserves hesitate to obey Ourabi's mandate.

The declarations made in both Houses of Parliament on Monday night, though necessarily reserved, were of great importance. Ourabi Pasha and his military followers have been acting with reckless audacity in the belief that France and England would never agree upon any plan of intervention. Lord Granville and Sir C. Dilke were, however, able to announce that "a perfect understanding" had been established not only as to what course was to be taken now, but as to what is to be done "in the case of certain possible contingencies;" and our Foreign Minister was, moreover, able to give the assurance that their decisions were indorsed by the other members of the European Concert. To have brought matters to this point, considering the somewhat exaggerated claims of France and the jealousy of the Powers, is a diplomatic exploit of which Lord Granville may well be proud. The first step—a naval demonstration—has already been taken. Three French and three English ships of war have arrived at Alexandria. The Porte, which has protested against this step, is clamorous to send a strong force to Egypt to settle matters after its own fashion; but as France strongly opposes the direct intervention of the Sultan, it is believed to have been decided that, should the emergency arise—which our Foreign Minister does not expect—a small Turkish force, to be called gendarmes, is to be landed in Egypt and placed under Anglo-French control with a view to restore order, or rather to arrest Ourabi and those who are most implicated with him.

There have been new and important developments of the Irish problem during the week. Both the promised Government measures—the one coercive, the other remedial—have been laid before Parliament. The Bill for the Prevention of Crime in Ireland is believed to be more severe in its provisions than any that has ever been passed by the British Legislature. Being mainly framed with a view to prevent "the action of secret societies and combinations for illegal purposes in Ireland," it provides for the trial of offenders in certain cases without jury, by a Special Commission composed of three Judges, whose conviction must be unanimous; it invests two stipendiary magistrates with summary jurisdiction and the power of punishing offenders; it makes districts in which outrages occur pay compensation to their victims; and it revives the Alien Act with a view to arrest or expel foreigners, such as Irish-Americans. These are, in brief, the drastic provisions for preventing, detecting, and punishing crime; and the power to put them in force is invested absolutely in the Lord Lieutenant. Little objection is made to them, though the Judges are said to have formally protested against the onerous duties imposed upon them, and have proposed as a substitute special juries, with power to return verdicts by a majority. The bill, which is very comprehensive, consists of thirty clauses. It confers "general powers" of arrest, especially at night; authorises searching for arms; proposes to punish intimidation; confiscates newspapers under certain circumstances, and suppresses dangerous public meetings. Against the provisions that have a political aspect, and those which invest the magistracy with extended jurisdiction, Mr. Parnell and his colleagues passionately protested on the introduction of the bill last week; and they are expected to offer them a strenuous if not an obstructive opposition, in which they will be more or less joined by the Irish Liberals.

This elaborate measure for extirpating agrarian crime which, with or without modifications, is sure to pass, has been speedily followed by the introduction of the promised scheme for dealing with arrears of rent. It was briefly explained by the Prime Minister on Monday night. The bill is limited to tenancies of £30 (under Griffith's valuation), and the relief afforded is in respect to rent due anterior to November, 1880. In fact, the arrears dealt with are, in the main, those incurred during the three preceding disastrous seasons, long before there was any general refusal to pay rents, and the relief is only to be given to tenants who have paid a year's rent up to November, 1881, and who have proved before a competent tribunal their inability to pay more. On the application of either landlord or tenant, up to Midsummer next year, a settlement must be compulsory, and the advance, which will not be a loan, but a pure gift, must not be more than one year's rent, or one half of the arrears due. The amount required for carrying out this measure of relief is roughly estimated at two millions sterling, towards which there may be a million and a half from the Irish Church Surplus, and the balance is to be drawn from the Consolidated Fund. The plan proposed by the Government is open to obvious economical objections, and the substitution of gifts for loans is of doubtful utility, but the greatness of the emergency overrides such considerations. It is "a bold remedy for a perplexing evil," and as such is likely to pass. We may devoutly hope, with Mr. Shaw, that the passing of this measure will have more effect than anything else in pacifying Ireland.

The debate on the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill, which is set down for second reading on Monday next, was preceded and followed by an exciting discussion as to the negotiations or exchange of views that preceded the release of the three "suspect" M.P.'s from Kilmalham Jail. Ministers being challenged on the subject, Mr. Parnell himself read his first letter to Mr. O'Shea on the subject, dated April 28, which stated that if the Government would propose certain amendments to the Land Act, such as the settlement of the arrears question, and the extension of the purchase clauses, he had every confidence that the exertions "we should be able to make, strenuously and unremittently, would have the effect of stopping outrages and intimidation of every kind;" and thus there would be no need for further coercive legislation. At the end of the letter there were words, only read out under compulsion from Mr. Forster, to the effect that a practical settlement of the Land Act would enable Mr. Parnell and his friends "to co-operate with the Liberal party in forwarding Liberal principles," which words naturally provoked derisive cheers from the Opposition. Subsequently more letters were read, including one from the Prime Minister, in the course of which he said that "assuredly no resentment, personal prejudice, or false shame, or other impediment extraneous to the matter itself will prevent the Government from treading in that path which may most safely lead to the pacification of Ireland." Under the influence of the awful events of the last fortnight, there is, happily, a singular absence, on the part of Englishmen, of vindictive feeling towards Ireland, and a tendency to accept in substance the two-sided policy of the Government. Whatever may truly lead "to the pacification of Ireland" is of infinitely more consequence than the promotion of party objects. Most people will be inclined to deplore that, owing to a variety of causes, Mr. Parnell and his adherents have acquired so much ascendancy in the sister island; and most people will also agree that a policy of justice and conciliation is the best means of counteracting such influence. In the irregular and peculiar debate of Monday, the Land League leader indicated that he recognised the obligations he had tacitly accepted, and that he was not insensible of having laid himself under the reproach contained in Mr. Chamberlain's letter that he had acted as if his object were "to embitter and prejudice the English nation." The debate was renewed on Tuesday with augmented party heat and passion, which was sternly rebuked by the Prime Minister, who challenged the Opposition to a formal vote on the subject. If the fearful tragedy in Phoenix Park has brought Mr. Parnell and his friends into a better frame of mind, there can be no more effectual way for them to give effect to their new convictions than by co-operating not only in passing the remedial measures now before Parliament, but in helping to carry the measure which has been framed to put down the terrorism of secret societies, and to extinguish agrarian murders and outrages in Ireland.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

The Lyceum Theatre presented on Monday afternoon last a curious spectacle. A numerous group of the nobility and gentry who are habitually occupants of the stalls and private boxes, sat on this occasion on the stage; while the stalls and boxes were tenanted by leading lady and gentlemen members of the theatrical profession. There was, however, a strip of border land just in front of the footlights between the patrons of the drama and the professors of the drama itself. This was the space reserved for the speakers, among whom were a peer of the realm, a popular dramatist and actor, an equally popular light comedian, two accomplished actresses, a favourite low comedian and manager, a well-known poet and journalist, a noted opera-bouffe artist, and a gentleman who is a novelist, a painter, a poet and composer, and a man of fashion all rolled into one,—quite a "Libraryarius," as Mrs. Malaprop might say.

The occasion of this gathering—significantly representative, as it was, of the kindly rapprochement at present existing between Society and the Stage—was a meeting in support of the proposed scheme for the establishment of a School of Dramatic Art. The Earl of Wharncliffe was in the chair, and prefaced his very lucid and comprehensive speech by an expression of regret at the absence of Lord Lytton, who would have presided at the meeting but for a recent bereavement, and of the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, whom an unforeseen occurrence had kept away. It is gratifying, however, to learn that the Lord Mayor had consented to the holding of a public meeting at the Mansion House in aid of the scheme some time next month.

In addition to the Earl of Wharncliffe, there were present the Marquis and Marchioness of Bristol, the Marquis and Marchioness of Headfort, the Countess of Wharncliffe, Viscount and Viscountess Barrington, the Hon. Mary Boyle, Lord Rowton, Sir Percy Shelley, Sir Algernon Borthwick, and Sir Julius Benedict; while among others who had signified their approval of the scheme are the Marchioness of Salisbury, the Earl of Dartmouth, the Earl of Rosslyn, Sir T. B. Lennard, Sir Baldwin Leighton, and the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. I cite the names of these grandees not because I regard a title of nobility as a sweet morsel to be rolled under the tongue, but with a deliberate purpose: inasmuch as the final cause of the meeting was to pass a resolution (it was unanimously carried) to appeal to the public at large for funds wherewith to start the proposed school; and it is desirable that the public should know who are the personages who have given this undertaking their countenance, and who are prepared to extend practical support to it.

When the Mansion House meeting is held we shall know how much money is wanted. I do not think that the promoters will ask for any very large sum. It is not intended to squander thousands on the erection of a big building with Queen Anne "fixings" in an expensive neighbourhood. The modest ambition of the friends of the school is to secure the lease of convenient premises in a central neighbourhood, where, by a competent staff of teachers, male and female aspirants for the stage can be taught elocution, gesture, dancing, fencing, and, if need be, modern languages. In a very short time the School might be made self-supporting; reduced fees, however, being accepted in the case of the sons and daughters of professionals.

Some capital speeches were delivered at the meeting, notably by Mrs. Stirling, Mrs. Kendal, Mr. Henry Neville, Mr. J. L. Toole, Mr. Dion Boucicault, Mr. Alfred Austin, and Mr. Edmund Roudledge; and the proceedings terminated with unanimous votes of thanks to the Earl of Wharncliffe for presiding and to Mr. Henry Irving for granting the use of the theatre for the meeting.

The energetic and enterprising lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre, Mr. J. H. Mapleson, or "Colonel" Mapleson, as the Americans delight to call him, writes to the Times to remove the impression potentially conveyed in a leading article of that journal to the effect that the "figure" to be paid to Madame Adelina Patti for her forthcoming season in the United States was "probably imaginary." We have now Mr. Mapleson's printed word for it that the most enchanting prima donna of the age is engaged to him for six months, beginning in October next. Madame Patti is to sing at least twice a week, for which she is to receive the sum of nine hundred and seventeen pounds a night; and the sum of nine thousand one hundred and seventy pounds has already been placed to her credit at her banker's in New York as a guarantee for the payment of ten nights' services. Thus for fifty performances, from October to March inclusive, Madame Adelina Patti will be the richer by forty-five thousand eight hundred and fifty pounds.

Pur dessus le marché the Diva will have her private Pullman travelling car, containing drawing and dining rooms, kitchen and sleeping accommodation for the whole of her servants, "as well as two cooks who will accompany the expedition."

The terms, obviously, are tremendous; but it must in fairness be remembered that the times have altered. I read in the "Reminiscences of the Opera," by the late Mr. Benjamin Lumley, that in 1847 he entered into an engagement with Mademoiselle Jenny Lind, the "Swedish Nightingale," who, for an operatic season reckoned from April 14 to Aug. 20, was to receive the sum of four thousand eight hundred pounds. Besides this, a furnished house and a carriage and pair were to be placed at her disposal; and an additional thousand pounds were to be paid her in the event of her wishing to pass a month in Italy, for study or repose, prior to her debut. The "Nightingale," to be sure, cost Mr. Lumley a great deal more than this, for he had undertaken to bear her harmless in any action which might arise from her having broken a contract previously entered into with Mr. Alfred Bunn, of Drury Lane Theatre. In due time Manager Bunn brought his action and recovered two thousand five hundred pounds damages—the whole making, with costs, a pretty penny.

I cannot lay my finger on the precise "figure" of the terms paid by London managers to Madame Catalani; but they were, if I mistake not, much larger than those paid to Jenny Lind for her first season in London. For an autumnal tour in the provinces, however, in 1818, the "Nightingale" received ten thousand pounds. Yet, in the very early days of the Italian Opera, the famous Farinelli received for his services during a brief summer season a sum of no less than fifteen thousand pounds, together with a free benefit which realised an additional sum of two thousand pounds. This was in 1734. How much would Farinelli's salary be equal to now?

Talking of the remuneration of artists, I cannot help thinking that Mr. John Everett Millais, R.A., would enjoy a very hearty laugh were he to read a recent article on himself, his work, and his income, in the Paris Figaro. The accuracy of the statement that Mr. Millais receives two thousand pounds for a half-length and three thousand for a full-length portrait I do not venture to question; and I thoroughly agree with the chroniqueur in saying of the great English painter that Il est grand, blond, rose comme un bel Anglais; d'un caractère franc, ouvert, très accueillant, ce que les Anglais appellent the good fellow.

It is with pleased interest also that I learn that "l'éminent Anglais" gives four soirées, to each of which two thousand guests are always invited, in the course of every season. It is edifying also to learn that "J. E. Millais, a débuté par des portraits d'une exécution presque mesquine." The writer of this remarkable essay seems to be wholly unaware that Mr. Millais is the author of "The Order of Release," the "Huguenot," "The Eve of St. Agnes," and "The Black Brunswicker;" that he is one of the finest landscape-painters that ever lived; and that if his portrait of Madame Bischoffsheim, exhibited in Paris in 1878, "prit les proportions d'une œuvre sensationnelle," a sensation as great had been excited by the exhibition of the "Ophelia," in the Champ de Mars, in 1867.

The gallant non-commissioned officers of one of her Majesty's regiments of infantry in garrison at Gibraltar wrote to ask "whence the term 'spuds' is derived, as applied to potatoes." The spokesman of my correspondents has noticed, "as a general rule, that any one of the name of Murphy is familiarly nicknamed 'Spud'."

"Spud," in the interests of philology, is by no means unworthy a paragraph or two, presenting as it does a curious instance of metonymy. In the "Slang Dictionary" (Chatto and Windus, 1874) I find "Spuddy" given as a seller of bad potatoes, while "spuds" are defined as a low-life term for raw potatoes; and roasted spuds are those cooked in the cinders with their skins on. On the other hand, "spud," in the country, would appear to be less a slang expression than a term of agricultural technology. No verbal mention of "spud" is made under the head of "potato" in "London's Cyclopædia of Agriculture;" but I am given to understand that the name "spuds" is applied to a certain class of diminutive potatoes reserved, not for eating, but for planting. Some bucolic correspondent will, I have no doubt, be so kind as to inform me whether it is the watery or the mealy end of the tuber which is called a "spud."

But whence "spud" itself? Obviously, I should say, from the short knife used in cutting up the potatoes for planting, and for "dibbling" the holes in which the sections of the tubers are to be deposited. Bailey, Worcester, Walker, Chambers, Hyde Clarke, and the "Library" Dictionary, all give "Spud" as a knife. The "Imperial Dictionary" says that "spud" is derived from the Danish "spyd," a spear; the Icelandic "spioot," adding that it is an implement somewhat like a chisel with a long handle, used by farmers for destroying weeds. Thus Swift—

*My spud these nettles from the stones can part;
No knife so keen to weed thee from my heart.*

At the same time, more than one of the dictionaries convey the hint that "spud" is a term of contemptuous disparagement for any short thing. It seems to have been so employed long before potatoes became an article of general consumption. In the "Great French Dictionary," by Guy Miège, Gent.: London, 1698, "spud" is translated as "un méchant petit couteau," and as equivalent to "a little scurvy fellow"—"un bout d'homme." "Spud" finds no place in Phillips's "New World of Words," in which "potatoes" are defined as "a kind of fruit, coming originally from the West Indies."

Mem.: There is a faint suggestiveness of "spuds" in the contemptuous American locution as to a man being "very small potatoes."

The Associated Coachbuilders—I beg pardon, the Institution of British Carriage Manufacturers—have a grievance; although why they should send me a circular in which I am specially and earnestly required personally to attend a Mass Meeting, to be held at Freemasons' Hall on Friday evening, the nineteenth instant, I fail to discern. The deplorable creatures who derive a precarious livelihood from the exercise of their pens are not in the habit of riding in coaches. What, then, are the grievances of the carriage manufacturers to the Distressed Compiler? They hotly protest against the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to saddle pleasure-carriages with additional taxation; and, not without some show of reason, they ask, if a carriage tax is considered to be a tax on luxuries, why such luxuries as expensive pictures, engravings, and photographs; furniture, jewellery, and musical instruments; pleasure-yachts and boats, furs, silks, laces, and wearing apparel (of an expensive kind bien entendu) should be left untaxed? The neatest "point" made, I take it, is that relative to the photographs. A penny stamp compulsorily attached to every published carte de visite would bring in a very large revenue. Such a tax was levied in the United States during the Great Civil War; and it certainly did not seem to deter people from being photographed.

To the appreciation of the fortunate mortals whom the poor call "carriage folk," I leave the appreciation of the following curious extract from the circular:—

The effect of the reduced incomes of the trader and trading classes, in addition to the tax, has been to induce carriage owners to economise by having their old vehicles patched up, giving a shabby look to the carriages in the parks, streets, and roads, causing foreign visitors to remark on their worn and untidy appearance, and inducing them to buy their vehicles in foreign cities, where the general appearance is more pleasing and attractive.

Is that so? Let the carriage-owners wince. My withers—I should more appropriately say my C-springs—are unwrung. It is, at the same time, very disheartening to learn that the Superior Orders "buy their vehicles in foreign cities." In the preface to a somewhat scarce book, "A Treatise on Carriages," by William Felton, coachmaker, Leather-lane, Holborn, published so long ago as 1794, I read:—"The superior excellence of English workmanship in the construction of carriages has not only been the occasion of a very great increase in their number among the inhabitants of this country, but the exportation of them to foreign nations in time of peace is become a considerable and profitable branch of British Commerce."

Mem.: In Mr. Felton's time the associated coachbuilders and harness-makers dignified themselves with the name of "Brights." The tradesmen concerned in the manufacture of the principal materials of which a carriage is composed, such as wheelwrights, smiths, painters, carvers, joiners, and so forth, were contemptuously dubbed "Blacks."

I have a crow to pluck with Mr. Alfred Rimmer, the author of a very amusing and daintily illustrated book called "Rambles round Eton and Harrow," just published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus. In his notice of Slough what does Mr. Alfred Rimmer mean by omitting all notice of the ancient church of Upton-cum-Chalvey, and of that most interesting old manor-house Upton Court, with its lake, its ancestral hall, its venerable thatched roof, its rats and its Friday night Ghost of a Woman in White? Upton Court, they say, is at least six hundred years old. Its timbers are Spanish chestnut. It was originally a "cell," so I have read, of Merton Abbey; and an iron slab at the back of the fireplace in the Hall, embellished with a relievo of the Royal arms and the date 1622, induces me to conjecture that in the seventeenth century Upton Court may have been the lodge of the Master of the Buckhounds.

I note that in page three Mr. Rimmer states that "George III. is said to have related with great gusto a tale of a Scotch schoolmaster who accompanied him to the door of the school-room with his hat on, and when outside the door he said to the uncovered Monarch—"who, by-the-way, was then only Prince of Wales" (sic)—"you will not think me wanting in courtesy I hope; but the fact is this, that if the boys thought there was anyone else as important as myself I should never get any obedience again." Aye! but are not the personages in the real story not George III. when Prince of Wales, and a "Scotch schoolmaster," but Charles II. and Dr. Busby?

I like big books—not necessarily very tall tomes, but very stout ones. One of the most corpulent volumes with which I am acquainted is Mr. Bernard Quaritch's "General Catalogue of Books," which is nearly as broad as it is long, and is actually half an inch thicker than the Post-Office Directory, although the Catalogue just falls short of 2400 pages, whereas Messrs. Kelly's enormous volume numbers, including the advertisements, over 2900 pages. Cassell's "Domestic Dictionary" runs to nearly 1300 pages; the second volume of "Burdett's Official Intelligence" has nearly 900 pages; while just 1000 pages (folio ones, too) make up the Bluebook containing the report of the trial of Queen Caroline in 1820.

The latest addition to my stock of "stout" literature is "Hubbard's Newspaper and Bank Directory of the World," containing the names and descriptions of thirty-three thousand newspapers and fifteen thousand banks, with an atlas and gazetteer combined. The work is in two volumes, making together some 2500 pages, and the general title is printed in Chinese, in Arabic, in Greek, in French, Spanish, German, Italian, and English. A chromolithographed portrait of the compiler of this giant performance adorns volume the first; and it is almost unnecessary to add that Mr. Hubbard is an American.

I turned curiously to the three pages devoted to the newspapers and periodicals published in Greece. Close upon a hundred are enumerated: a highly respectable aggregate when one remembers that the population of the Kingdom of the Hellenes is under 1,700,000. Some of the names of the Greek journals are sweetly pretty. What do you say to "Aletheia" (Truth), "Eleutheria" (Liberty), "Palingenesia" (Regeneration)? There is also a "Kookos" (Cuckoo), and an "Astér tōn Kukladōn," or Star of the Cyclades. In translating Ραμπάγας (Rampagas), a humorous journal published at Athens as "Rampages," Mr. Hubbard, or one of his sub-editors, has made rather a comical mistake. The modern Greeks have no B in their alphabet; and the second letter therein, which we pronounce as beta, they pronounce as vita. So, when it is absolutely necessary to pronounce the letter B, two letters in combination, mp, are employed to express in writing and in print the name of the lacking letter. "Rampagas" is evidently "Rabagas," after the hero of M. Sardou's play.

Obviously, there is no rule without an exception; and in the case of "Byron" I have seen the poet's name written "Burōn," and not "Mpurōn." G. A. S.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

"Odette." I hied to the Haymarket once more on Monday last to listen to the exposition of the tribulations of the erring spouse of Lord Henry Trevène, the genial misanthropy of Mr. John Stratford, the frolicsome Bohemianism of Lady Walker, the dulcet matrimonial dalliance of Mr. and Mrs. Philip Eden, the innocent sweethearth of Eva Trevène and Lord Shandon, and the incomparably impudent cynicism of M. Narcisse, maitre d'hôtel to Dr. Broadway Wilkes, money-lender, philosopher, and scoundrel. I mean the lacquey, not the Doctor. The latter, in addition to being a rascal, is a quack, and a spiritualist as well. The house on Monday was crowded by an audience as numerous as it was fashionable, and "Odette" is evidently a hit. Much of its success is due, of course, to the admirable manner in which, with scarcely an exception, the characters in the drama are acted; but it possesses another attraction, which may have conducted to its immediate acceptance by polite society, in the circumstance that, albeit avowedly an adaptation from the French, the dialogue in "Odette" may almost lay claim to originality in respect to its curiously polyglot diction. The characters seem to have been at a feast of languages and to have stolen the scraps. Their speech "in loftiness of sound is rich"—a "Babylonish dialect."

A particoloured dress
Of patch'd and piebald languages,
'Twas English cut on Greek and Latin,
Like fustian heretofore on satin.

Or, stay; do you remember that oft-quoted announcement in the album of the Continental hotel?—

In questa casa trovate,
Tout ce que l'on pourrait souhaiter:
Vinum, panem, aquam, carnis,
Cochæa, horses, dogs, and harness.

I quote from memory, and possibly not quite accurately. If the Russian Prince had only exclaimed, "Zdessa nochüy," when he made his furtive entrance to Odette's apartment, and "Porá yéhat!" when he was collared by Lord Henry Trevène; or if the possible Egyptian Prince in the fez and with the star in the Second Act had only remarked "Lazème nouellou leddar" when his Highness found that things at Dr. Broadway Wilkes's were getting "a little mixed," I should have gone home to bed happy. As it was, I was fain to be content with Lady Walker's inimitably vivacious "Fà Caldo!" Lingua Toscana in Bocca Romana, indeed. It is, indeed, in this same Second Act that the principal amendments in the way of these curtainments, the necessity for which was so evident on the first night of "Odette," have been made, and with excellent effect. It is, however, the pruning-knife and not the axe which has been used; and in candour I am bound to admit that in what remains there is very little which can be called redundant. In the gaming-house scene the gentleman who pretended to go mad, and invoked the shade of the late Earl Russell, has disappeared; and judicious excision has also been the fate of the antiquated Princess, who declined to sell her pug-dog (or was it a poodle?); but Mr. Pinero continues to delight us as the London tradesman; Mr. Hanway, with his watch-chain hanging loose, and displaying at its extremity a bunch of keys in lieu of the valuable watch of which he has been robbed; and the Vice-Consul of the Republic of Guatemala, with his many decorations, and whom I cannot help suspecting to be connected with the Nice police, still makes his entrance with the same mysterious equanimity, and bears his ignominious expulsions from Dr. Wilkes's salon with equally mysterious imperturbability. The fact is, that the Second Act of "Odette" is little more than a shifting panorama of cosmopolitan characters, or rather caricatures; and without these the action of the play itself would have been very laggard and feeble. As to the scene with which the act in question opens, I regard the conversation between Mr. Arthur Cecil, as Mr. John Stratford, and Mr. C. Brookfield, as the polished, complacent, and knavish maitre d'hôtel, Narcisse, as an effort in comedy of the very brightest kind. A French scholar would, of course, look upon an act little short of literary sacrilege the most modestly veiled attempt to compare even the best of the work of any living French playwright with the most trifling production of Molière; but to readers on this side the Channel I may venture to express the opinion that in polish, sparkle, inexhaustible repartee, and the keenest satirical acumen—which should be the most conspicuous feature in genuine comedy—the scene between John Stratford and Narcisse may be compared—and not disadvantageously to the modern production—with the famous scene between Don Juan and Monsieur Dimanche in the "Festin de Pierre." Both scenes are wit-combats between two exquisitely skilled masters of dialectical battledore; and the shuttlecock never falls for an instant to the ground. As it happens that both Mr. Arthur Cecil and Mr. C. Brookfield are accomplished French scholars, I should dearly like to hear them, at some morning performance, essay this scene between the audacious libertine and the too-confiding tradesman in the native tongue of Jean Baptiste Poquelin, called Molière. As for the Stratford and Narcisse episode, it is the feature in the second act, which is again materially strengthened by the wonderfully clever acting of Mrs. Bancroft as Lady Walker. The manner in which she uses her fun in order to warn the credulous Hanway as to who are the most disreputable persons among Dr. Wilkes's guests is worthy of a Anteonada Scyllana at a bull-fight. Mr. Bancroft continues to struggle most manfully with the not very thankful part of Lord Henry Trevène; for, deeply as we sympathise with the sorrows of that much-wronged husband, a great deal of his subsequent behaviour to Odette seems not only just, but brutal. It is difficult to avoid the conviction that the errors of Lady Henry Trevène have been—dramatically, at least—too heavily punished; and that in depriving her of her child, and telling Eva herself that her mother was dead, there was not only cruelty, but treachery and fraud. Madame Modjeska as "Odette" had, I thought, immensely improved since the first night's performance, when she was painfully nervous; and when this gifted lady is suffering from nervousness she becomes almost unintelligible. The deep pathos of her deliverances in the last act wins, of course, all hearts; but, as acting of the highest kind, I prefer her scenes of passionate recrimination with her husband in the first and third act. As for her flinging the cards at the head of the detected swindler in the gaming-house scene, with a shriek of "voleur!" accompanying the unladylike act, I have already hinted that it is a mere piece of stale and vulgar stage trickery, unworthy of a great dramatist and a great tragicienne. On the whole, I am disposed to regard "Odette" as a play with a plot which is far from elaborate; which has one very strong act—the first, or prologue—and three very weak ones to follow; but which is splendidly acted and superbly placed on the stage.

So on Tuesday I went to Toole's Theatre, once more to behold the hilarious "Auntie" and the famous Trial-Scene of "Bardell versus Pickwick," with which the entertainments at the pleasant, elegant, and comfortable little establishment in King William-street at present conclude. The late Count de Montalembert was prosecuted under the Second Empire for remarking that whenever he visited England, and listened to a debate in our House of Commons, he felt as though he were taking "a bath of Constitutional Liberty." I humbly hope that no legal proceedings will be taken against me for saying that to witness "Auntie" and the Trial from Pickwick in the course of the evening is equivalent to enjoying a warm, cold, tepid, and vapour bath of healthy merriment, to which are added several douches of laughter and any quantity of jocular shampooing. "Auntie" goes as swimmingly, or rather as roaringly as ever; and the house, apparently puzzled to decide whether the first prize for downright fun should be awarded to Mr. Toole as Mr. Benjamin Bunny, to Mr. Billington as General Mogador, to Mr. E. D. Ward as Mr. Loadington, to Mr. E. W. Garden as Snorum, to Mr. Shelton as Wallop, to Miss Emily Thorne as Mrs. Dragoon, to Miss Winifred Emery as Mrs. Bunny, to Miss Effie Liston as Mrs. Mogador, or to Miss Eliza Johnstone as the much ill-used but certainly strong-minded "Cook," compromises matters by awarding the talented troupe first prizes all round. As for the Trial of "Bardell versus Pickwick," it awakens one continuous scream of cackination. "See Naples and then Die," says the Italian proverb. To the hypochondriacal, one might say, "See Toole as Sergeant Buzfuz and then Get Well." The learned Serjeant is admirably seconded by Mr. Billington as the Junior Counsel for the plaintiff; by Mr. E. W. Garden as Sam Weller, and by Miss Emily Thorne as Mrs. Cluppins. Mr. Westland as Mr. Justice Stareleigh made a delicious hash of verbal things in general in his summing up; and Mr. G. Shelton was divertingly imbecile as the forensically bullied and badgered Mr. Winkle.

MUSIC.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

"Rigoletto" was given on Thursday week—for the first time this season—with the special feature of Madame Albani as Gilda, in which character the performance of the great prima-donna was of the same excellence as before. Madame Trebelli was again the Maddalena, and Signor Frapolli the Duke; Signor Pandolfini having been a very efficient representative of the title-character. On Tuesday "Mignon" was given, with Madame Albani in the title-character, in which her performance was of the same vocal and dramatic excellence as before; another valuable feature in the cast having been Madame Valleria's performance as Filina. Mdle. Stahl—whose recent début we have recorded—quite sustained the favourable impression then made by her singing and acting as Federico. Signor Lestellier, as Guglielmo, was well received on his first appearance here; but of his qualifications we must await further opportunity for judgment. He seems to possess good stage experience; and probably, with increased confidence, may discard somewhat of the tremolo which was too frequently prominent in his singing on Tuesday. The cast of the opera was very efficiently completed by M. Gailhard as Lotario, M. Soulaeroux as Luerte, and Signor Scolaro as Gianni. Of the first appearance this season of Madame Adelina Patti we must speak next week. Madame Pauline Lucia is to appear on May 27, and Madame Christine Nilsson is engaged for the production—next month—of Boito's "Mefistofele."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

Herr Wagner's Nibelungen opera-dramas have been repeated, on Friday (yesterday) week, Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday, with some changes in the casts. In "Das Rheingold," and the two following divisions, the part of Wotan was transferred to Herr Reichmann, who displayed much merit in acting and declamation.

DRURY-LANE.

Of the performances of German opera at Drury-Lane Theatre we must speak next week, the first representation having occurred on Thursday evening, too late for present notice. We have more than once drawn attention to the arrangements for this important event, and must be content, as yet, to repeat that the inaugural performance was to consist of "Lohengrin," with Frau Sucher as Elsa, Frau Dely as Ortrud, Herr Winkelmann as Lohengrin, Herr Dr. Kraus as Telramund, Herr Kogel as the King, and Herr Ehrke as the Herald. Among other important features of the scheme is the co-operation of Herr Richter as conductor; Herr Carl Armbruster being chorus-master. The orchestra is that of the renowned Richter Concerts; the chorus being chiefly that of the Hamburg Opera.

The Philharmonic Society's fifth concert (last but one of this season) brought forward a new pianoforte concerto, composed by Signor Sgambati, by whom it was performed with great success. The composer, although still young, has for several years enjoyed a high reputation in Italy, and some of his instrumental chamber music has been given in this country, and met with much approval. The concerto is framed on an ambitious scale, the first movement, "Moderato Maestoso," especially. In this there is somewhat of diffuseness and redundancy of subject and treatment. The themes, however, are bold in themselves, and the writing, both for the solo instrument and the orchestra, is spirited and varied. The second movement, a "Romance," is very pleasing and melodious, and the final "Allegro animato" is full of well-sustained spirit and vivacity. The passage-writing for the pianoforte abounds with difficulties in the bravura style, well calculated for the display of the instrument, and of special skill in the executant. They were rendered by Signor Sgambati with rare mechanical power and certainty, and with thorough command of light and shade. The piece and the performer were much applauded. Weber's exquisite music to the drama of "Preciosa" opened the concert. The one song for the heroine was charmingly sung by Miss Santley; and the choral and orchestral portions of the score—with the beautiful ballet-music—were very efficiently rendered; the dramatic text having been well recited by Mr. S. Brandram. Madame Nilsson sang, with great effect, Mozart's aria, "Mi tradi," and Schubert's "Serenade;" unaccompanied pianoforte solos were successfully performed by Signor Sgambati. Beethoven's Pastoral symphony and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser" completed an interesting programme.

The second of the series of symphony concerts, conducted by Mr. Charles Hallé, took place at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) week, when the programme included the last and grandest of the completed symphonies of Schubert; that in C major, and other orchestral pieces well rendered. Beethoven's overture and incidental music to Goethe's "Egmont" was a feature in the concert. The two songs for Clara were finely sung by Madame Sachse-Hofmeister, as were the scena from "Oberon" and an air by Gluck. The third of the symphony concerts took place on Thursday evening. Of the performances we must speak next week.

At the Floral Hall last Saturday afternoon a concert was given by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, in conjunction with the Royal Italian Opera company, in aid of the funds of the Royal College of Music. Special features were the vocal performances of Madame Albani and Madame Christine Nilsson. Both artists sang with great effect—the former in the scena "Ah! fors'è lui" from "La Traviata" and Gounod's "Ave Maria," and the latter in some Swedish melodies and a serenade by Braga. The violin obbligato in the "Ave Maria" and that in the serenade were played by the Duke of Edinburgh; Mr. Sullivan having presided at the harmonium in the first, and Mr. Bambridge at the pianoforte in the other. Effective vocal performances were also contributed by Signori Mierzwinsky and De Reszke and M. Bouhy; and the Amateur Orchestral Society performed several pieces.

Mr. John Boosey's morning Ballad Concert at St. James's Hall, last Saturday afternoon, was of the usual attractive description; a varied selection of songs and ballads having been effectively rendered by Miss Santley, Mesdames Sherrington, Sterling, and Fassett; Mr. Maas and Mr. Santley. Another concert of a similar kind has been announced for this (Saturday) afternoon.

The third Richter Concert of the present series (on Monday evening) brought forward the new symphony by Anton Dvorák, the Bohemian composer, whose works have lately attracted much attention both abroad and here—some of which have been noticed by us. The symphony was first given in England at a recent Crystal Palace concert. Again, on Monday, it was favourably received, especially the very characteristic "Scherzo." Madame Marie Roze sang the scena from "Der Freischütz." Herr Rappoldi played a prelude and fugue by Bach—each with much success; and the concert closed with an effective performance of Brahms's "Requiem," the solos in which were assigned to Madame Roze and Mr. F. King.

Madame Dumtsa (a Hungarian vocalist) gave a matinée at the Marlborough Rooms; and Miss Florence Perrigini a matinée on the same day at Steinway Hall. Miss Agnes Ross gave her annual evening concert at St. James's Hall in the evening, when the programme comprised an attractive selection of music, chiefly vocal.

An afternoon concert was given at the Royal Albert Hall on Wednesday, when the programme included the co-operation of Madame Christine Nilsson. An evening concert was given by Mr. Clement Hoey at the Victoria Hall the same evening in aid of the Princess Frederica's Convalescent Home. The programme was well varied, and the conductors named were Sir J. Benedict and Signori M. Costa and Pinsuti. Mr. C. T. Speer gave the first of two Pianoforte Recitals at the Royal Academy of Music, the programme having been of a varied and sterling character. The Holborn Orchestral and Choral Society gave its first concert, at the Holborn Townhall, in evening, when the programme included Professor Macfarren's cantata, "May-Day," and a miscellaneous selection.

Miss Philp's evening concert took place at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday), when several eminent vocalists and instrumentalists contributed to a varied programme, which comprised some new songs by the concert-giver.

Mr. Ganz's third orchestral concert takes place this (Saturday) afternoon, when Liszt's "Daute" symphony is to be repeated; and Miss Anna Bock's pianoforte recital takes place at the Marlborough Rooms this afternoon.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society will give their third (and final) concert of the season at the Highbury Athenæum next Tuesday evening.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF SHIP MODELS.

WINNERS OF THE GOLD MEDALS.

This admirable international exhibition (of which we gave an illustration last week) was promoted by the Shipwrights' Company of the City of London, and held in Fishmongers' Hall. It proved a complete success, and was brought to a close last Saturday. We give the winners of the gold medals:—

In the important sections of war-vessels, the models, being contributed by Governments, did not receive any award, except for torpedo-boats, in which, from the jealousy of giving the faintest hint of the most recent improvements, there was only one competitor—viz., the well-known firm of Yarrow, of Poplar, who took a gold medal for models of these marvellous little craft adapted to a speed respectively of twenty-five miles and eighteen miles an hour. In the important section for passenger-steamers, Mr. John W. Shepherd, M.I.N.A., took the gold medal for the model of the steamer Austral, the grand vessel of the Orient Line, now on view in the Albert Docks, and about to sail on her maiden voyage to Australia. Messrs. Napier and Sons, Glasgow, had a gold medal for a half model of the Aberdeen, a Suez Canal boat. In the class for Atlantic cattle and grain steamers, Earle's Shipbuilding Company took a gold medal for the Grecian Monarch, one of the London Line of "Monarch" steamers, which was brought prominently into notice a few weeks back by transporting "Jumbo" across the Atlantic. In the class for steamers making short sea passages, the gold medal went to Stavanger, Stoberi, and Dok, of Stavanger, Norway, who had three admirable models. Messrs. Archibald McMillan and Son, Dumbarton, held the gold medal for a 2000-ton ship called the Falconhurst, now building. In the Larger Yacht Classes the gold medal went to G. L. Watson and Co., Glasgow, for a full model of a sailing schooner of the latest type, of very fine model, and of admirable construction. In the Smaller Class, the Marquis of Ailsa won the first prize for a 40-ton cutter; while for Steam Yachts G. L. Watson and Co. were again successful for a grand 14-knot craft of 715 tons, 197½ ft. long, 27½ ft. broad, and 19 ft. deep. Sims and Tongue, of Hull, took the first prize for a model of a trawler of 80 tons, ketch-rigged, with all the most modern fittings, for this branch of the North Sea fishing, to which every year gives greater importance.

The Dutch Government and Dutch exhibitions were very successful for an exhibit which, both for amount and for excellence, was the admiration of all who visited the Exhibition.

The exhibits not sent for competition were so many and so admirable that the judges felt bound to acknowledge them by the following special awards:—Oscar H., King of Sweden and Norway, a model of a fast-going screw pleasure-yacht, from a design presented to his Majesty by R. O. Haren. To mark the excellence of the design, and to record the fact of the value of the admirable exhibits forwarded to the Shipwrights' Exhibition, by naval architects, subjects of his Majesty; gold medal. H. A. Blom, Chief Constructor Royal Norwegian Navy, model of the ancient Viking ship; gold medal. R. O. Haren, Stavanger, model of steam pleasure-yacht; silver medal. R. O. Haren, Stavanger, model of a fast and profitable sailing-ship; highly commended. Nylands Varksted, Kristiana, owning deck passenger and mail steamer; highly commended. Akers Mek Varksted, full model iron screw-steamer for whaling; highly commended. To Mons. Olivier Briess, St. Malo, for full-rigged model of two-decker, supposed to have been made by English prisoners during the war 1793–1815; silver medal. To his Excellency the Minister of Marine, the Hague, for thirty-five interesting models from the national collection at the Hague; gold medal. To Messrs. E. J. Bok and Lonen, Amsterdam, for fishing-lugger for deep-sea fishing; silver medal. To Lewis Temple, New Bedford, Mass., for centre-board yacht; silver medal. To W. B. Barker, Nyack, New Jersey, for American yacht; silver medal.

ROYAL ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

SCULPTURE AND PORTRAITS.

There is not much in the sculpture this year more than heretofore to justify the appropriation to it of the large Lecture-Room as well as the Central Hall. There is, however, as we fondly hope and believe, at last some little advance in this country both in the cultivation and appreciation of what should be the noblest and purest form of art.

Among the few works of classical and ideal character are the statues by young Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, of "Artemis" and "Teucer," now completed, the one in marble, the other in bronze; but we have little to add to what has already been said of the models. The constrained action of the first—i.e., the carrying of the left arm behind the body to hold the hound in check on the contrary side—is expressive—expressive of the disorder of the chase, yet seems hardly consonant with the dignity we look for in an ideal conception. Moreover, the complicated disarray of the drapery on the thorax seems to add to the slight awkwardness. The arm raised to draw an arrow is also not quite satisfactory—it has too much of individual nature. Still, as a whole, the statue is spirited and original in a high degree, and, for the most part, beautifully wrought. The "Teucer" has all the tense energy of the model: every muscle is set to give purchase for the strong sidelong pull and the steady aim; and now the eye is less caught by prominent nodules of joints and starting tendons. This is one of the few quite justifiable purchases made by the Academy from the funds of the Chantry bequest. A word of warm praise is likewise due to Alfred Gilbert's "Kiss of Victory" (1597)—a youthful warrior falling dead into the embrace of a winged victory; and Percival Ball's "Lancashire Witch" (1571)—a happy and significant allegory. The Lancashire Witch is a nude female figure, embodying the industrial spirit of the great county. She is breaking a sword across her knee that is to be replaced by the shuttle of the weaver, the lamp of the miner, and other emblems of labour and commerce by her side. The action is perfectly understood; the modelling of the rounded limbs, well-proportioned torso, and shapely extremities admirable. Mr. Ball was a gold medalist of the Academy a number of years back, if we remember rightly; but this is the first time that he has come so prominently to the front.

Mr. Birch sends a bronze reduction of his "Last Call" (1551), with all its vigorous merit concentrated. Why, we would ask, is not this, and still more the sculptor's "Lieutenant Hamilton in the Sortie from Cabul," popularised in moderate size? Had such works been produced in France they would have been commissioned in replica by the Government, and diffused throughout the land. By Mr. Birch there is also a charming bust of Blanche, daughter of Mr. W. Hughes (1619), with an inclination of the head, half shy, half coquettish, yet altogether milder. Mr. Boehm, the R.A. elect, appears in force. First and foremost, we have a statue in marble of Thomas Carlyle, to be reproduced in bronze for the Thames Embankment—where the original so often perambulated for his "constitutional." The figure is seated, the face instinct with intense cogitation, the likeness "lifelike"; while the folded hands are not the least excellent portions of the whole. In other contributions the sculptor's keen perception of characteristic forms, expression, and traits have, perhaps, carried him a little too far. In the model of the bronze statue of Lord Lawrence erected in Waterloo-place—standing with a sword in one hand and a pen in the other, as he may have addressed the Sikhs, when asking them by which they would be ruled—the leonine countenance will be accepted, but the "plant" of the legs strikes us as rather excessively defiant, and more reserved dignity might have been given to the sturdy figure with advantage to it as an artistic memorial. Again, in the bust of Mr. Bright (1677) the combativeness of the preacher of peace is brought, in the expression, very saliently forward. Mr. Woolner's apparent aim lately at monumental largeness is attended with very unequal results—happiest in the bust of the late Lord Clanwilliam (1675), it fails lamentably in that of the late Mr. E. M. Barry (1670); nor can we find much to admire in the present works of Mr. Armstead. A. Legros makes his debut here as a sculptor with "The Sailor's Wife" (1676), a pathetic figure, her eyelids drooping from long watching for the bread-winner; but the conventional baby asleep on her lap is an eyesore. Some bronze medals of notabilities by the same show a sense of style; but, as portraits, they are little better than charges.

There are several portrait works of ability and interest; among which we may name the busts of Admiral Sir Henry Keppel (1561), a thoroughly individualised and happy rendering, by Count Gleichen; of John Landseer, father of Sir Edwin (1569), and Mr. James Heywood (1547), by Adams Acton, both very characteristic, and the best by this sculptor we have seen for some time; of Lady Sophia Macnamara, a skilful and charming work in terra-cotta by Miss Henrietta Montalba; of Dean Stanley (1567), by W. R. Ingram; of Mrs. Villiers Stuart (1667), by T. N. Maclean; and of the late Mrs. Horace Brown (1692), by G. Halse—all three refined in feeling; of the Duchess Dowager of Cleveland (1582), by R. Belt, curiously minute in the carving; and others by A. Fabrucci and W. D. Keyworth, jun. We should mention also a pretty group of children, by L. Fabrucci, called "Waiting for Mamma" (1576). There are, as usual, besides, a few works by Italian sculptors, in which skilful and painstaking imitation of textures and accessories is lavished on generally trivial themes. A typical example of these is Cheloni's small half-figure of a little boy, with a tray full of boxes of cigar-lights slung round his neck, deploring the badness of business as he fingers his solitary soldo!

The proposal to erect a Memorial, by national subscription, in honour of Sir Francis Drake, the famous Elizabethan navigator and one of the naval heroes of that age who defeated the Spanish Armada, was started a few months since by some of the patriotic townsmen of Plymouth; and it is designed to place this monument on Plymouth Hoe, where Drake is said to have stood, quite ready for the fight, and waiting to embark, when the Spanish fleet was entering the Channel. In further commemoration of the Drake Tercentenary—though it will be in 1888, six years hence, that the three-hundredth anniversary of the Armada Defeat will occur—an interesting Exhibition of three pictures, by eminent artists of our day, has been opened at the establishment of Messrs. Graves and Co., 6, Pall-mall, illustrating that glorious event in England's history. We would strongly recommend a visit to this unique exhibition, which a few days since was honoured by the presence of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the Grand Duke of Hesse and Princess Victoria, and the Crown Prince of Denmark. The exhibition comprises three noble works—namely, "The Sailing of the Armada from Ferrol," by Mr. Oswald Brierly; "The Armada in Sight, Plymouth Hoe," by Mr. Seymour Lucas; and "The decisive Battle off Gravelines," by Mr. Oswald Brierly. A suitable description, with historical and biographical notes, is given in the pamphlet offered to visitors.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, May 16.

The event of the week is the opening of the "Exposition Internationale de Peinture" in the new galleries of the Rue de Sèze. The ceremony of the inauguration on Monday evening was the occasion of a brilliant full-dress parade of the artistic, literary, and fashionable celebrities of Paris. Ministers, ambassadors, duchesses, poets, painters, journalists, all were there; for the announcement of the exhibition had created a lively curiosity. It was felt that in some measure the "Exposition Internationale" meant a revolution in the Parisian art world. The idea of this exhibition is due to three foreign painters resident in Paris—MM. J. de Nittis, Alfred Stevens, and Madrazo, who form the committee. In future, each year eminent and representative painters of the different nations will be invited to contribute to the exhibition. The material conditions are perfect: a handsome room decorated in the finest taste, plenty of wall space, no paltry rivalry, no seeking after vulgar effect and school-boy recompenses as at the Salon; in short, an exhibition of choice works of the élite of the artistic world. The exhibition this year consists of some eighty pictures, the work of fifteen artists, representing, respectively, France, Jules Dupré, Gérôme, Baudry; England, Alma Tadema, J. E. Millais; Belgium, Alfred Stevens; Holland, Josef Israels; Italy, J. de Nittis; Spain, Madrazo; Germany, Knauts, Menzel; Russia, Bogoluboff, Pokitonow; Sweden, Wahlberg; and Austria, Charlemont. The mere list of the names will give some idea of the importance of the exhibition. But, brilliant as it is this year, it will be still more brilliant next year, for the artists invited will have a longer time in which to prepare their work, and the importance of the exhibition will, doubtless, cause them to exert themselves to the utmost to maintain their own reputation and that of the country which they represent. In such a galaxy of talent it is difficult to make comparisons. I am, however, only recording the general opinion when I say that the "lions" of the exhibition are Baudry, Alma Tadema, De Nittis, and Stevens. Mr. Millais has created a sensation by his two portraits, and especially by that of Mrs. Jopling; but his other picture, the "Boyhood of Sir Walter Raleigh," only serves to illustrate the inequality of this artist's great talent. Doubtless, if Mr. Millais had had longer notice he would have been represented more adequately. Mr. Alma Tadema's pictures are greatly admired, as I have said. He exhibits "The Parting Kiss," "The Bath," the "Tepidarium," "Ave, Caesar!" and several portraits. M. de Nittis has two sensational pictures, "Les Courses à Longchamps," and a "portrait de Mue. de N.," an exquisite symphony in white, with a background of falling snow seen through a bow window—a de Nittis in an entirely new manner. The same artist's "Races at Longchamps" is unquestionably a masterpiece. Alfred Stevens, that other master of modernism, exhibits some twenty pictures, "Les Visiteuses," "The Sphinx Parisien," "L'Orpheline," and some marines, &c. Amongst the pictures by Jules Dupré, English visitors will notice with interest the large work, "Environs of Southampton," painted by the artist in England in 1837. Knauts and Israels also have fine exhibitions, but I have not space to give them more than a passing mention. In short, and to conclude, the "Exposition Internationale" is an artistic event of the first order, and a success of the same kind.

In the lobbies of the Senate and Chamber and in political circles, the great topic of discussion has naturally been Egyptian matters; but as, thanks to the concerted action of the British and French Governments, satisfactory measures are being taken, that topic is now worn out, and the lobby gossips have returned to the Grisel banquet. This affair, which took place at the Elysée Montmartre last Wednesday, was to have been an apotheosis of labour. Somehow or other, it degenerated into a scuffle. The Radical deputy and poet, M. Clovis Hugues, was turned out by force, and M. Gambetta had an opportunity of making a speech, in which he dwelt upon his rôle of a pacificator. M. Gambetta's speech was harmless and apparently insignificant, and yet his adversaries try to make out that it was neither more nor less than an appeal to the country against the present Chamber. After all, it is simply a matter of caprice. Now the country rages against M. Gambetta on account of a speech of the same character and of the same significance as the speeches that threw the country into ecstasies of admiration when, not long ago, Gambetta was the idol of the hour.

In the Chamber yesterday an important and stormy discussion took place on M. Jules Roche's bill for the secularisation of the property of religious congregations, seminaries, &c., and for the separation of Church and State. Finally, the bill was taken into consideration by 289 votes against 139, and referred to the Commission charged with the study of the proposition relative to the grave question of the separation of Church and State.

The Tribunal of Commerce gave judgment in the affair of the famous Union Générale on Monday. The point at issue was this: last November the Union Générale raised its capital from 100 to 150 millions by the issue of 100,000 shares of 500f. reserved to holders of original shares at the rate of one new share for two old shares. The Tribunal has pronounced this issue of scrip to be null and void, owing to numerous irregularities specified at length in the judgment. The consequence of this decision is that people who speculated with this scrip speculated on nothing, and therefore owe nothing, and that the intermediaries or commissaires are indemnified. This decision has caused great joy on the Bourse.

MM. Octave Feuillet and Ivan Tourgueneff, the celebrated novelists, are both dangerously ill at the present moment.

Classical scholars will be glad to learn that the publisher, Calmann Lévy, has just issued the second volume of the late Paul de Saint-Victor's work, "Les Deux Masques." This volume contains erudite and brilliant studies of Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes. The third and concluding volume of the work, devoted to Shakespeare and the French stage up to Beaumarchais, will appear shortly. T. C.

Sir A. Galt has resigned the post of Agent-General in England for Canada for private reasons, but his resignation has not yet been accepted by the Dominion Government.

A lawn tennis tournament will be held on June 20 and following days at the Agricultural Hall, London, under distinguished patronage, the profits of which will be devoted to the funds of the Scarlet Fever Convalescent Home and of the London Fever Hospital. Particulars can be obtained from the hon. sec., Captain Lee Warner, Ashfield, Bedford.

The report of the National Provincial Bank of England for 1881 states that, including £37,651 brought forward, the net profits for the year amounted to £441,539. Out of this sum a dividend of 8 per cent and a bonus of 5 per cent have been already distributed, and it is now proposed to pay a further bonus of 7 per cent, making a total distribution for the year of 20 per cent. The balance carried forward is £39,351, and the reserve fund stands at £1,278,750.

THE NEW IRISH GOVERNMENT.

The new Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Earl Spencer, has held that high office before, from 1868 to 1874, under Mr. Gladstone's first Administration. The Right Hon. Sir John Poyntz Spencer, K.G., Earl Spencer, Viscount Althorp and Spencer, Baron Spencer of Althorp, was born in October, 1835, only son of the fourth Earl, and nephew to the distinguished nobleman better known as Lord Althorp, who was, from 1830 to 1834, one of the most valued colleagues of Earl Grey and Lord John Russell in the Reform Bill Ministry. The present Earl Spencer was educated at Harrow School and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1857. He was elected, in April of that year, M.P. for South Northamptonshire, but upon his father's decease, at the end of the year, became a member of the House of Lords. He was Groom of the Stole to the late Prince Consort, and subsequently to the Prince of Wales. His Lordship is much esteemed, not only as a statesman of high character, of liberal principles, and of proved administrative ability, but as a country gentleman who has effectively discharged all the duties of social life, and has taken his part in local public business; he is Lord Lieutenant of Northamptonshire, and was formerly Chairman of Quarter Sessions; an officer of Rifle Volunteers, sometime President of the National Rifle Association, and Master of the Pychley Hunt. The peerage dates from 1761, as Baron and Viscount, the Earldom from 1765, but several of the family had before won distinction in the public service.

Countess Spencer, whose Portrait accompanies that of her husband, is the Right Hon. Charlotte Frances Frederica, fourth daughter of Mr. Frederick C. W. Seymour, and great-grandchild of the fourth Marquis of Hertford. Her Ladyship was born in 1835, and was married to Earl Spencer in 1858, but has no children. Lady Spencer arrived in Dublin on Thursday week; her husband had arrived on the Saturday before.

The new Chief Secretary for Ireland, succeeding the lamented Lord Frederick Cavendish, is Mr. George Otto Trevelyan, M.P. for the Border Burghs (Hawick, Galashiels, and Selkirk). He is the son of Sir Charles Trevelyan, Bart., formerly of the Indian Civil Service, Governor of Madras, and Financial Member of the Indian Government Council at Calcutta. Lady Trevelyan, the mother of Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, was sister to the late Lord Macaulay, being daughter of Mr. Zachary Macaulay, an eminent associate of Clarkson and Wilberforce in the abolition of the slave trade. Mr. G. O. Trevelyan was born on July 20, 1838, at Rothly Temple, Leicestershire, and was educated at Harrow School, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was second in the first class in classics. He was elected member for Tynemouth in the Liberal interest in 1865, and for the Border Burghs in 1868. He was a strenuous advocate of the abolition of purchase in the Army, and the equalisation of the suffrage. Mr. Trevelyan was appointed Civil Lord of the Admiralty in Mr. Gladstone's Government in December, 1868, but resigned office in July, 1870, because of a difference of opinion with the Cabinet in connection with the Education Bill. He was appointed Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty in November, 1880, and has till now held that post. He is the author of "The Competition Wallah," "Cawnpore," "The Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay," "The Early Life of Charles Fox," and other works of considerable literary merit. Mr. Trevelyan married, in 1869, Caroline, eldest daughter of Mr. R. N. Philips, of Manchester.

The new Under-Secretary of the Irish Government, in place of the late Mr. T. H. Burke, is Mr. Robert George Cruikshank Hamilton. He is the son of the late Rev. Z. Macaulay Hamilton, D.D., parish minister of Bressay, one of the Shetland Islands, and a relative of the late Lord Macaulay. Mr. R. G. C. Hamilton was born in 1836, graduated M.A. at the University of Aberdeen in 1855, and the same year entered the Civil Service as a temporary clerk in the War Office. He served in the Crimea, in the Commissariat Department, a few months later. After being employed, on his return from the Crimea, in the Office of Works, Mr. Hamilton was transferred to the Education Department, in which he remained eight or ten years, often engaged in important special services. He passed afterwards to the Board of Trade, to which he was appointed Accountant, and subsequently Assistant-Secretary. Mr. W. H. Smith, the First Lord of the Admiralty, in 1878, made him Accountant-General of the Navy. Mr. Hamilton is a member of the Royal Commission on Colonial Defences, and of the Patriotic Fund. He was also Secretary of the Civil Service Inquiry Commission, presided over by Dr. Lyon Playfair. Mr. Hamilton's powers of organisation and administration have been recognised by both political parties, and there are probably few instances in which a member of the Civil Service, entering it in a subordinate capacity, has risen so rapidly. A very few days ago, he was appointed by Lord Northbrook to be Under-Secretary to the Admiralty, but had scarcely entered upon that office before he was suddenly invited to become permanent chief of the administrative offices at Dublin Castle.

Mr. Henry Jephson, who was Private Secretary to Mr. Forster as Chief Secretary for Ireland, has been appointed to the same post under Mr. Trevelyan.

The Portraits of Earl Spencer and Lady Spencer are from photographs by Chancellor, of Dublin; that of Mr. Trevelyan from one by Mr. John Y. Hunter, of Hawick and Jedburgh; and that of Mr. Hamilton from one by Lombardi and Co., Pall-mall East.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Yacht Squadron last Saturday the Prince of Wales was unanimously elected Commodore, the Marquis of Londonderry continuing as Vice-Commodore. The King of Sweden was elected an honorary member of the squadron.

The arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool last week from the United States and Canada show a large decrease in live stock, and but a slight increase in fresh meat, in comparison with the preceding week: total, 759 cattle, 490 sheep, 4261 quarters of beef, and 942 carcasses of mutton.

The newly-appointed Financial Secretary to the Treasury, upon the vacancy of that post, caused by the removal of the late Lord Frederick Cavendish to the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, is Mr. Leonard H. Courtney, M.P., who has been Under-Secretary for the Colonies, and was previously Under-Secretary for the Home Department. He is succeeded in the Under-Secretaryship of the Colonies by Mr. Evelyn Ashley, M.P., who till now has held the post of Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade. John Holms, M.P., has been appointed Secretary to the Board of Trade, in the room of Mr. Evelyn Ashley. It is understood that Mr. Herbert Gladstone will take the post of Junior Lord of the Treasury, vacated by the member for Hackney. Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, M.P., Financial Secretary to the War Department, will succeed Mr. G. O. Trevelyan as Secretary to the Admiralty. He is succeeded as Financial Secretary to the War Office by Sir Arthur Hayter, Bart., M.P., at present one of the Lords of the Treasury.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Parliament has—for a moment—been permitted to withdraw its attention from Ireland to Egypt. Our political parrots who are wont to catch at a phrase—the Pumblechooks who delight to roll a salient sentence over their tongues in preference to taking the pains of mastering the substance of a speech—had in both Houses sprung to their feet, and, with swelling mien, demanded Ministerial explanations of an expression used by M. De Freycinet in his late speech on Egypt. The expression of the French Minister was construed into a claim for a “preponderating influence” of France in the disturbed realm of the Khedive. Mark what a simple explanation on the part of Earl Granville and Sir Charles Dilke on Monday smoothed these ruffled plumes!

The Foreign Secretary and his colleague—two diplomatists it would not be easy to match for coolness in either House—were on Monday enabled to show that England and France have throughout the Egyptian crisis been acting in perfect unity and loyalty. Whilst the two Powers have recognised the title of the Sultan to the suzerainty of Egypt, the status quo in which Turkey aims to preserve, the other Powers of Europe have always admitted a preponderating interest of England and France in Egypt, and have in the present juncture sanctioned the steps taken by the allied nations. Of course, the French Ambassador was prompt to supply Earl Granville with a courteous assurance that M. de Freycinet never meant to claim any “preponderating” influence for France in Egypt, as the context of his speech would prove. His Lordship added that France and England had each ordered three men-of-war to rendezvous at Suda Bay, in order to proceed to Alexandria, whither orders had preceded them. And not only orders! Happily for the peace of Egypt, Tewfik Pasha and his Ministers had been in a manner reconciled. Recourse to foreign aid for the maintenance of order became unnecessary for the time being.

The Marquis of Salisbury—whose clear, incisive sentences fall with welcome sharpness on the ear—tersely expressed his satisfaction at Earl Granville's statement; but forcibly added that the best way to avoid the painful necessity of drawing the sword in the affairs of Egypt would be to let it be quite clear “the sword is there;” and, in case of need, pointed to “the sword of Turkey” as the one to use.

The Archbishop of Canterbury on Tuesday secured the second reading of a bill which will, it is to be hoped, soon cause the prison bolts and bars of the Rev. Mr. Green to fly asunder. The object of this Imprisonment for Contumacy Bill is to empower the Archbishop of the Province to petition a Court to liberate from prison a contumacious clergyman.

From the Rev. Mr. Green to the “Salvation Army” is a leap indeed! Yet it was taken by the House of Lords on Tuesday, after the parenthesis filled with a certain degree of dry humour by the Earl of Rosebery, apropos of the need of sanctioning the Municipal Corporations Bill, which proposes to stimulate some sleepy hollows into new life. That most bland and amiable of peers, Earl Fortescue, smilingly held his benignant shield in front of that most noisy of Churches militant, the “Salvation Army;” and the Archbishop of Canterbury himself lifted his voice in favour of tolerance for General Booth's legions. Lord Coleridge, too, was to be found joining Earl Fortescue in deprecating the harshness of a sentence passed in Southampton against a private in the “Army” for an alleged assault during a “Salvation” procession.

Earl Granville at the close of Tuesday's interesting sitting had the satisfaction of stating that her Majesty had granted a pension of £400 a year to Miss Burke, the sister of the late Under-Secretary for Ireland.

The bill of the Government for the Repression of Crime in Ireland rather surprised the House by its stringency. Conspicuously in mourning, and the majority just returned to the nine o'clock sitting from the quiet churchyard at Edensor, in which the remains of Lord Frederick Cavendish had been laid amid tokens of almost unparalleled respect, hon. members were, as a body, attuned to the occasion. Lord Selborne was among the most attentive in the thronged Peers' Gallery to the statement which Sir William Harcourt made, in the absence of Mr. Gladstone. The unqualified and, truth to tell, rather turgid indictment of the secret societies of assassins in Ireland was swiftly followed by a lucid exposition of the Ministerial measure of safety. In the first place, there would be a Special Tribunal, in which such crimes as treason, murder, and attempted murder would be tried by three Judges instead of a Jury, the verdict of the Judges to be unanimous to secure a sentence—subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court, which might diminish the sentence. Then, for the prevention of crime, in certain districts to be proclaimed, the Police would have the power of search, the power of arresting prowling strangers, the power of expelling suspected foreigners “from the realm;” and the inclusion of membership of a secret society and intimidation as offences within the Act. The additional Police requisite would be maintained at the cost of the locality, which would further be called upon to disburse for outrages committed within its limits. The Repression Act is to last three years, but the Home Secretary had every confidence that under the scrupulously just and considerate administration of Earl Spencer the measure, whilst affording prompt protection to the peace-abiding in Ireland, would only deal hardly with the guilty.

Favourably received by Sir Stafford Northcote on behalf of the Opposition, the Repression of Crime Bill met with instant and almost fierce denunciation from the extreme section of Irish Home Rulers. But there was an interlude. That prominent member of the Turveydrop school of deportment, Mr. Henry Chaplin, remembered a phrase formerly uttered by Mr. Bright, and taunted him with having declared, “Force is no remedy.” True, answered the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in one of the most incisively eloquent impromptu speeches that have rung through the House for some time (would we could hear more of them!), but if the hon. member had read the speech, he would have found that what was said was that, “force is not a remedy for the discontent existing in and arising from causes which are sure to produce discontent.” Mr. Forster had anticipated Mr. Bright by rising to support the statement that “Force is no remedy;” and the right hon. gentleman seized the opportunity to severely lecture Mr. Parnell and his confederates for having conducted the Land League agitation in such a way as to directly incite to crime and murder in Ireland. Neglecting to reply on the spur of the moment to the charge of the ex-Secretary, Mr. Parnell again deplored the crime in the Phoenix Park, but earnestly inveighed against the new measure which proposed to place the lives of the people of Ireland at the mercy of partisan Judges, and predicted failure for this last attempt to discover the undiscoverable—“the task of governing one nation by another.” In the same strain of spoke Mr. Dillon and other Home Rule members, including their English ally, Mr. Joseph Cowen, the violent language of Mr. Healy calling forth a timely rebuke from Mr. Goschen; and it was not till a late hour that Sir William Harcourt saw this urgent measure read the first time.

Ireland was uppermost in the Commons on Monday. The Opposition guerrillas, not slow to hurl any weapon which may in their opinion be hard enough to damage the head of the Government, sought to make use of what has been termed “the Kilmainham compact” to the discredit of Mr. Gladstone. Without dwelling upon the miserably personal attacks delivered on Monday and Tuesday, when precious hours were wasted by the Opposition and Government in protracted animadversion and defence, it may be said the upshot of the straggling, vituperative discussion was that it was made clear that Captain O'Shea used his good offices to make known to the Prime Minister and the late Chief Secretary Mr. Parnell's views as to the conciliatory attitude the Land League leaders would be likely to adopt were the arrears question to be settled, and the tenure and purchase clauses of the Land Act to be settled; but that Mr. Gladstone and all his colleagues, save Mr. Forster, resolved to release Mr. Parnell quite independently of the olive-branch offered by him, welcome though his co-operation in promoting the peace of Ireland would be. It is true, the memorandum Mr. Forster read of a conversation with Captain O'Shea implied “that the conspiracy which has been used to get up boycotting and outrages will now be used to put them down.” But the hon. and gallant member denied the accuracy of this rendering of what passed between him and Mr. Forster. And, perhaps, it will be best to waste no more words upon the negotiations which gave rise to so much acrimonious speech on Monday and Tuesday.

The Arrears of Rent Bill for Ireland, which Mr. Gladstone sandwiched between the personal discussions on Monday, is certainly simple and sweeping. Remarking first on the fact that the Land Commission, having been enlarged, would be adequate to deal with this new class of applicants, the Prime Minister soon showed that the Government had in part adopted the plan of Mr. Parnell's bill, introduced a Wednesday or two ago by Mr. Redmond. Application of the bill is to be limited to holdings not over £30, Griffith's valuation, but at the initiation of either the landlord or tenant. What would follow may be best explained in Mr. Gladstone's own words:—“When the tenant shall have paid or made an arrangement with the landlord for the rent for the year from November, 1880, to November, 1881; when the State shall have made its contribution, which shall not exceed one year's rent or one-half of the total arrears; then the whole of the rest of the arrears shall be cancelled and released.” The source from which the Government would derive the public contributions to pay for the said arrears would be “the surplus of the Church temporalities, and, so far as they may prove insufficient for the purpose, from the Consolidated Fund.” As to the sum total which would be possibly required, the Premier did not think it would exceed two millions, of which one million and a half would be covered by the residue of the Irish Church surplus. But Sir Stafford Northcote pertinently asked, “What are you going to do with regard to the persons who have paid, not only at a sacrifice to themselves, but under circumstances of considerable danger?” Well, it remains to be seen whether the plan of Mr. W. H. Smith, on the farther proposal of the Government, is the more acceptable to the House on this score.

The disposition to give a more earnest consideration to practical suggestions for the removal of Irish grievances was again evident in the House on Wednesday. Albeit the second reading of the Irish Poor Removal Bill to prevent the return of worn-out Irish people to Ireland was negatived by 172 to 91 votes, its purpose met with much sympathy; and Mr. Dodson promised to introduce a measure to deal with the question of settlement generally. The Allotments Bill and the Supreme Court of Judicature Amendment Bill were read the second time.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

The King returned from the north of Italy on Sunday morning. An official denial is given to the statement that the object of his journey to Monza was to make preparations there for the reception of the Emperor of Austria.

The Senate held a sitting on Sunday in order to conclude the debate on the treaty of commerce with France. Signor Rossi's motion in favour of a general revision of the Customs Tariff was agreed to, and the Treaty itself was approved by 90 votes against 15.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

In the Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath Count Schönerer presented on the 11th inst. a petition against the settlement of the Russian Jews in Austria. On the 12th inst. the House read the Customs Tariff Bill, and the bill for the grant for the restoration of order in the disturbed provinces for the third time, and agreed to the Austro-Servian Navigation Convention. The Lower House of the Hungarian Diet also passed the Customs Tariff Bill.

The Ring Theatre trial terminated last Saturday in Vienna, and judgment was given on Tuesday. Herr Jauner, manager of the theatre, the workman Nitsche, and Inspector Geringer were pronounced guilty of contributing to the catastrophe by their negligence. The manager was sentenced to four months' simple arrest, Inspector Geringer to strict imprisonment for the same period, and Nitsche to eight months' imprisonment. In the two last cases an additional punishment is inflicted of one fasting-day a month. The other defendants were acquitted.

GERMANY.

The Emperor William began his partial inspection of the Guards last week. His Majesty showed astonishing vigour considering his great age, and was warmly cheered.

The Empress, who is at present on a visit to her daughter at Baden-Baden, sent one of her ladies-in-waiting recently to Ems to greet the Empress Eugénie and present her with a handsome bouquet of violets.

Princess William of Prussia continues to make satisfactory progress towards convalescence. The infant Prince is described as a fine, healthy baby, with the blue Hohenzollern eyes. The Crown Princess has been most assiduous in her attentions to her daughter-in-law, who has two English nurses specially recommended by Queen Victoria.

The Four Hundred and Fiftieth Anniversary of the victory of the Brandenburg troops over the Hussites was celebrated on Monday at the little town of Bernau in tolerably fine weather. The Crown Prince, the Crown Princess, and Princess Victoria arrived by special train at half-past ten, and were received by the Mayor and Corporation of the little town amidst vociferous cheering from an enormous crowd of spectators, who had flocked thither from every quarter of the compass.

Prince Bismarck is stated to be suffering so severely from neuralgic pains that he is unable to walk, or even to stand.

The German Parliament, on the 10th inst., finally passed the Bill for the Consular Treaty with Brazil. The House subsequently proceeded to the discussion of the Tobacco Monopoly Bill; and on the 13th inst. resolved, by 162 votes to 121, to refer the bill to a committee of twenty-eight.

Yesterday week the Hygienic Exhibition Building in Berlin was entirely destroyed by fire. The Exhibition was to have opened on Tuesday. Many of the exhibits were burnt.

DENMARK.

The Landething and Folkething have adopted the compromise on the Budget question, which had already been agreed upon by the joint committee of both Houses. The Ministry had previously declared that they would not stand in the way of the proposed arrangement, and announced their intention of submitting the Budget in its new shape to the final sanction of the King.

SWEDEN.

Queen Sophia, having completed her treatment for heart disease at Amsterdam, has returned to Stockholm. Her Majesty appears to be perfectly restored to health.

RUSSIA.

The Imperial family on Saturday last transferred its residence from Gatschina to Peterhof.

The appointment of Count Tolstoi as President of the Academy of Sciences has been gazetted.

The Russian newspapers announce that the Holy Synod is contemplating the necessity of reducing the number of religious holidays observed by the Greek Church. The number of saints' days upon which workmen have a holiday in the course of the year is 160; so that, instead of doing about 300 days' work in a year, as in other countries, in Russia they hardly do more than 200 days.

The death of General Kaufmann, Governor of Turkestan, is announced.

The Council of Ministers have approved the plans for constructing a railway from Ekaterinaburg to Tiumen, in Siberia.

TURKEY.

The Convention between Turkey and Russia, in respect to the payment of the war indemnity demanded by the latter Power, has at length been signed.

It is stated from Constantinople that the new French Ambassador there has had a very cordial interview with the Sultan, the latter going so far as to shake hands with the Marquis de Nouilles—a proceeding very unusual with his Majesty.

According to a Constantinople telegram, the Porte has sent a circular to its representatives abroad protesting against the dispatch of foreign war-vessels to Alexandria on the ground that such action is not justified, and that if necessary it should devolve on the Sultan as Sovereign of Egypt. The Porte is also said to have sent a telegram to the Egyptian Ministry declaring that the convocation of the Chamber of Notables without the Khedive's sanction is contrary to the Constitution. Any act contrary to the orders of the Khedive, in accordance with the wishes of the Imperial Sovereign, will entail heavy responsibility upon the authors.

EGYPT.

According to despatches from Cairo the crisis is considered over for the present. At any rate, matters are in abeyance. The Khedive has resumed relations with his Ministers; but it is thought that the reconciliation is only of a temporary character. The Ministry have made submission to the Khedive, who treated them coldly, and said he would work with them to save the country. It is said that Arabi Pasha has called out the reserves (but they do not come) in consequence of the coming of the English and French squadrons, which have met at Suda Bay. It is believed that notice has been sent to the Porte that there is no intention to land troops, and if such a step became necessary the Porte would be asked to send them. Arabi Pasha is said to have become very unpopular among the Arabs. Great excitement continues to prevail in Cairo, and there is a general exodus of ladies and their families to Alexandria.

AMERICA.

A Select Committee of the Senate has reported in favour of granting the franchise to women.

The House of Representatives, by 172 votes to 7, has passed a bill creating a Department of Agriculture, and making the Secretary of Agriculture a Cabinet Minister. The House, by 132 to 66, has also passed the bill for distributing the balance of the Geneva award. It provides payment—first, for damages resulting from the attacks of Confederate cruisers, including those occurring within four leagues of the shore; and, secondly, of the claims for premiums for war risks, whether paid to corporations, agents, or individuals.

The Supreme Court of Columbia has overruled the exceptions taken by Guiteau to the sentence passed upon him, and his execution will take place on June 30.

There has been a meeting of Irish-Americans at New York to denounce the Phoenix Park assassinations. The police were present in force, as disturbance was feared from the O'Donovan Rossa faction. Mr. Parnell's mother said she would not mind being assassinated if the cause of Ireland were thereby benefited. An amendment to the principal resolution was carried, amid disorder, condemning the Dublin murders, but declaring it a source of greater regret “that England continued murdering Irishmen.”

Maculister, a town in Indian territory, in North America, has been destroyed by a cyclone. Seven persons were killed, four fatally and eleven dangerously wounded, while thirty-nine others received slight injuries. Fifty-eight houses were totally destroyed, and twenty more were badly wrecked.

A large Lacustrine canoe, in excellent condition, has been found near Bex, Switzerland, 4000 feet above the sea level, and nearly 3000 feet above the Valley of the Rhone. No Lacustrine relics have before been met with in Switzerland at such an elevation.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty's short stay in town last week was a busy one. The second Drawing-room was less fully attended, owing to the recent fatalities in Dublin, only 170 presentations being made. It having been the day of Lord Frederick Cavendish's funeral the bands were silent, saving the playing of a few bars of the National Anthem upon the arrival of the Royal personages at Buckingham Palace.

A deputation, headed by the Prince of Wales, from the United Grand Lodge of Ancient and Accepted Masons of England, presented an address of congratulation on her Majesty's merciful preservation on March 2. The Duke of Connaught was present, but the Duke of Albany was unavoidably absent. The Princess of Wales and Princess Beatrice were with her Majesty during the ceremony, which took place in the picture gallery.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and the Duchess of Connaught, paid a visit to the Royal Academy at Burlington House yesterday week, being received by the President, Sir Frederick Leighton.

Audiences were given by her Majesty to Countess Spencer on her departure for Dublin, and to the Premier. The Duchess of Argyll was presented to the Queen by Princess Louise of Lorne at Kensington Palace. All the Royal personages in town dined with her Majesty; and Prince Alfred and the Princesses of Edinburgh came to see the Queen. Her Majesty paid visits to the members of her family before returning to Windsor. Princess Beatrice went with Princess Christian to Her Majesty's Theatre, and with Princess Victoria of Hesse to the Court Theatre.

Last Saturday the Queen conferred the Victoria Cross on Lieutenant Alan Richard Hill, of the 2nd Battalion Northamptonshire Regiment; on Lance-Corporal James Murray, late of the 2nd Battalion Connaught Rangers; and of Private Edmond Fowler, of the 2nd Battalion of the Cameronians, and decorated five non-commissioned officers and men with the distinguished-conduct medal for bravery in the late Zulu war, Princess Beatrice being present. The Duke and Duchess of Albany arrived from Claremont.

The Dean of Peterborough performed Divine service on Sunday in the private chapel of the Castle, the Queen, Princess Beatrice, and the Duke and Duchess of Albany attending. Princess Christian visited her Majesty, and Princess Louise of Lorne arrived from town. Prince and Princess Christian dined with her Majesty on Monday.

Princess Louise of Lorne returned to Kensington Palace on Tuesday. The Duke of Albany also came to town. The Queen reviewed the troops at Aldershot, the total on parade being 9500 men, 1800 horses, and fifty-two guns. The band of the Duke of Connaught's brigade only played the National Anthem; his Royal Highness commanding the 3rd Infantry Brigade. The troops were in new uniforms. At the close of the movements her Majesty, who was accompanied by Princess Beatrice, the Duchess of Connaught, and the Duke of Cambridge, drove to the Duke of Connaught's quarters before returning to Windsor.

A Council was held by the Queen on Wednesday. The first state ball of the season was given that morning at Buckingham Palace.

A Levée will be held at St. James's Palace by the Prince of Wales, on behalf of her Majesty, on Monday; and the first state concert takes place next Wednesday at Buckingham Palace.

Colonel Lord Edward Pelham Clinton represented her Majesty at the funeral of Lord Frederick Cavendish at Chatsworth. The Prince of Wales, the Duke of Edinburgh, and the Duke of Cambridge were severally represented on the occasion. Miss Burke has received a touching letter of condolence from the Queen.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

An inspection of the 1st Life Guards, under the command of Colonel Keith Fraser, at the Hyde Park Barracks, was made yesterday week by the Prince of Wales, who was accompanied by the Princess of Wales, the Grand Duke of Hesse, Princess Victoria, the Crown Prince of Denmark, and Prince Frederick William of Hesse; their Royal Highnesses afterwards luncheon with the officers of the regiment. The Grand Duke of Hesse and Princess Victoria left Marlborough House last Saturday on their return to the Continent. The Prince and Princess accompanied their Royal Highnesses to the Charing-cross Station, and there took leave. Princess Christian luncheon with their Royal Highnesses. The Prince attended a meeting of the members of the Royal Yacht Squadron at Willis's Rooms, the Duke of Edinburgh being present. His Royal Highness accompanied the Princess to an afternoon concert at the Floral Hall, in aid of the Royal College of Music, at which the Duke of Edinburgh accompanied Madame Albani and Madame Christine Nilsson with the violin. The Duchess of Edinburgh and Prince Alfred and Princess Louise of Lorne were present. The Prince and Princess, with their daughters and the Crown Prince of Denmark, attended Divine service on Sunday. In this document, which is intended to back up the Land Bills issued by the Chamber a few months ago, there are embodied the views of upwards of 600 of the leading practical farmers throughout Scotland.

The Duke of St. Albans presided at Willis's Rooms on Tuesday evening at the annual festival in support of the Samaritan Free Hospital for Women. His Grace, in proposing the toast of the evening, bore testimony, from his own personal observations, to the value of the work carried on by the institution, and strongly urged its claims to support. The collection amounted to about £1300.

The new edition of that most useful directory, "Collingridge's City Directory," comprises several features well worthy of special attention. The extension of the street section alone gives it a claim to support; and the historical information which it gives respecting the City companies is full of interest. The work is carefully edited, and it is published by Messrs. Collingridge, at the City Press Office, Aldersgate-street.

At a special meeting of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce on Tuesday the President read the following letter from the late Lord Frederick Cavendish:—"21, Carlton House-terrace, S.W., May 5, 1882.—Dear Mr. Illingworth,—I shall be happy to subscribe £200 to the Technical School. I shall hope to be able to get to its opening next month, but that must, of course, be very doubtful.—Yours faithfully, F. CAVENDISH."

The fifth anniversary dinner in connection with the City of London Provident Dispensary, at 164, Aldersgate-street, was held on Tuesday evening at the Cannon-street Hotel, under the presidency of Lieutenant-Colonel Duncan, R.A. The dispensary, which also embraces a Surgical Appliance Association, was established in 1877, its object being in both branches to benefit the working classes and persons of limited means. The subscriptions amounted to a substantial sum.

The Salvation Army are at present engaged in holding a dedication congress, which began last Saturday, and was continued on Monday and Tuesday, to celebrate the opening of their National Congress Hall and Training Homes at Clapton. Representatives from all parts of the kingdom and from foreign parts were in attendance.

On Monday afternoon the Lady Mayoress (Mrs. Whittaker Ellis) distributed the prizes gained by the inmates of the Princess Louise Home, situated at Woodhouse, near Wanstead, which was founded in 1835 by the National Society for the Protection of Young Girls. The Lord Mayor, who had been expected to preside, was unable to be present owing to official engagements in the City.

While Sister Agnes, of the House of Mercy, Clewer, near Windsor, was making arrangements the other day with a cottager's wife at Dedworth for the reception of a little invalid boy who had been brought from London, she was told that the child had fallen into a pond near at hand. Sister Agnes, who is an excellent swimmer, without waiting for assistance, ran to the place, and finding that the boy had disappeared plunged into the water, and, directed by the air-bubbles rising among the duckweed on the surface, fortunately succeeded in rescuing him from being drowned.

Last Saturday the important collection of modern pictures formed by the late Mr. Edward Hermon, M.P., removed from Wyfold Court, Henley-on-Thames, was sold by Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods, at their rooms. The disposal of this valuable collection excited much interest in art circles. The sale-room was crowded and the prices ruled high, £10,920 being given for two oil paintings, and the sum realised by the day's sale was over £37,000.—The valuable collection of pictures and Sèvres china and old furniture formed by Colonel Arbuthnot, who has gone abroad, has been sold by the same firm, realising a large sum. The total of the ornamental objects amounted to £10,500, and of the pictures to £14,968.

Mr. J. H. Mapleson writes to the Times:—"In your leading article to-day (the 14th inst.) you appear to hint that the 'figure' to be paid to Madame Patti for my forthcoming season in the United States is 'probably imaginary.' I beg to inform you that Madame Adeline Patti is engaged to me for six months, commencing in October next, to sing at least twice a week, for which she is to receive £917 a night. The sum of £9170 has already been placed to her credit at her bankers' in New York as a guarantee for the payment of the last ten nights' services. In addition to this, Madame Patti will have her private Pullman travelling-car, containing drawing and dining rooms, kitchen, and sleeping accommodation for the whole of her servants, as well as two cooks, who will accompany the expedition."

A meeting of the Commissioners of Sewers was held on Tuesday, when the Finance and Improvement Committee, relative to the services of the officers in carrying out the Artisans and Labourers' Dwellings Act, recommended the following gratuities:—To the engineer, £1000; solicitor, £750; medical officer of health, £450; principal clerk, £200; first assistant clerk, £100; account clerk, £50. These grants were strongly opposed by Mr. Deputy Farar, who said that the engineer began with a salary of £500 per annum; in 1850 it was raised to £800, in 1853 to £1200, in 1863 to £1500, in 1874 to £2000. In this period he had received £12,900 in addition as gratuities, and had been permitted to act for the Thames Valley drainage, by which he had received £7900. It would be monstrous to vote the sum proposed, as the commission paid handsome salaries. After considerable debate, the report of the committee was carried by a large majority.

There was an evening meeting in Exeter Hall yesterday week in connection with the seventy-eighth anniversary of the British and Foreign Bible Society. It appeared from statistics placed before the meeting that the free income of the society for the year ending March 31 last had amounted to £104,837, whilst the sum received for Scriptures sold, both at home and abroad, had been £94,842, making, with £104 received on account of the Dixburgh Fund for Indian Colportage, a total of £199,781. For the year the expenditure had been £190,737. The issues of the society for the same period had been as follows:—From the dépôt at home, 1,509,136; from dépôts abroad, 1,429,409. The total issues of the association from its commencement up to the present amounted to 93,952,993 copies of Bibles, Testaments, and portions thereof. A summary of the work of the society and its operations in various spheres was given by the Rev. Mr. Sharpe.

Yesterday week, about nine o'clock p.m., a white-lead keg, about twelve inches long by six, with a piece of rag, which had been lighted, attached to it, was found in one of the kitchen windows at the Mansion House, in the narrow court between that building and St. Stephen's, Walbrook. The keg contained blasting gunpowder, and an inscription suggesting that the Irish landlords were the chief recipients of the Defence of Property Fund raised at the Mansion House. It is not probable that if the charge had exploded it would have done much mischief to the buildings near which it was placed, but it might have killed a passer-by. The contents of the canister have been analysed and found to consist, for the most part, of common blasting powder, mixed with a substance unknown to the analyst, no trace of nitro-glycerine being perceived. The City authorities have offered £500 reward for information calculated to lead to the discovery of the persons concerned in placing the canister and fuse. Extra precautions are being taken both by the City and Metropolitan police to guard against such attempts.

Both Houses of the Canterbury Convocation met in Dean's-yard, Westminster, on Tuesday week. The Archbishop of Canterbury presented to the Lower House a copy of the bill which it is proposed to bring into Parliament to allow of dealing with such a case as that of the Rev. S. F. Green, of Miles Platting. The bill was afterwards adopted by the Lower House with a request to the Bishops to introduce it into Parliament. In the Upper House the opium trade formed the principal subject of debate. In the Lower House the Rev. Canon Wilkinson moved a graves relating to the atrocious murders in Ireland, and requesting the Upper House to consider the propriety of endeavouring to set apart a day for national intercession, or of appointing a day for humble supplication. The motion was seconded by Canon Hind Howell, and agreed to. On Thursday the Upper House arranged to discuss the question of advising the clergy in regard to their duty towards the Salvation Army, pursuant to an extensively-signed graves, brought up from the Lower House. In the Lower House Canon Jeffreys presented a graves complaining of the interference of the new educational code with school managers, with respect to the limitation of the employment of pupil teachers to twenty-five hours weekly. In the Upper House, yesterday week, a Committee of Bishops was appointed to ascertain the tenets and practices of the Salvation Army, with a view of considering how far it is possible to attach it to the Church, and generally to advise the clergy as to their duty in regard to it. It was decided to sanction a form of prayer to be read during the continuance of the present troubles in Ireland. The Lower House having transacted other business, both Houses were prorogued to July.

DUBLIN CAR DRIVERS MEETING IN PHOENIX PARK TO DENOUNCE THE MURDERS.

THE SCENE OF THE MURDERS IN PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN.

THE FENIAN MURDERS IN DUBLIN.

A second week has passed since the perpetration of that atrocious crime, the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. T. H. Burke; the Chief Secretary, who had landed but a few hours before on the Irish shore, and had scarcely entered upon the duties of his important office; and the Permanent Under-Secretary, whose diligence, for many years past, in the service of Government, had never impaired his attachment, as a thorough Irishman, to the interests of his native country. Both these estimable public servants were innocent, to say the least, of any act or sentiment hostile to the welfare of the Irish nation or people; and it is difficult to conceive how either could personally have given offence to any class or party in Ireland, since the functions of Mr. Burke were non-political, and unconnected with the subject of the agrarian agitation; while Lord F. Cavendish had been sent over with a change of policy, with a mild and lenient aspect of Government, preceded by the release of the Land League popular leaders from their recent detention in prison. It cannot, however, be doubted that neither the Land League, nor any properly Irish party, was at all concerned in procuring or abetting these assassinations; but that they were the dire and detestable work of a conspiracy which is of foreign origin—which exists among the vilest and most desperate known outlaws of the great cities in many States of Europe and America—Nihilists, Anarchists, Communists, Fenians, cherishing one fell spirit of hatred to existing social institutions, and prompted by greed, as well as by envy and wanton malignity, to subvert all law and order by the terrorism of assassination. The Irish Land agitation has been seized as the latest opportunity for these inhuman practices, which must nevertheless be entirely distinguished from the late agrarian outrages, cruel and murderous as they were, provoked by the unhappy strife between landlords and tenants, and encouraged by the false, iniquitous, and immoral teachings of the Land League. Fenianism, which is a different thing, meant from the beginning no less than treason and murder, and this cruel, dastardly warfare of skulking stabbers and shooters, and exploders of dynamite or bombs contrived to kill unarmed and unsuspecting people. This is the enemy which England and what there is of good in Ireland now have to contend with; and it will soon appear to what extent Irish co-operation is forthcoming in the effort to suppress the enormous evil.

It had been supposed that the metropolis of Ireland, the head-quarters of Irish society, was in some degree, compared with the West and South, an abode of civilisation, with a humane, honest, and orderly population. It might have seemed impossible, in Dublin, that a band of worse than savage manslayers, after perpetrating their monstrous deed in the middle of the Park, in broad daylight, and in sight of many passengers, should drive away in a hired public vehicle, and with the help, in all likelihood, of neighbouring accomplices, should elude pursuit, no positive information being given, two weeks afterwards, concerning their movements before or since the murderous act. The deep disgrace which has fallen upon Dublin, by the exhibition of such gross indifference to the most heinous of crimes, if not tacit connivance, on the part of those, few though they may be, who must have known more of the circumstances than they choose to reveal, is felt by every respectable citizen; and this feeling is shared by other great towns of Ireland. Deputations from the Lord Mayor and Corporation of Dublin, the Mayors and Corporations of Cork and Belfast, the Dublin Chamber of Commerce, the Senate of the University, that of the Queen's College of Physicians, and other public bodies, have waited on Earl Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant, and Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, the new Chief Secretary, with loyal addresses which expressed their abhorrence of the hideous crime. In replying to these addresses, one day last week, Earl Spencer, after speaking with great affection of the two victims of murderous malice, who were personal friends of his own, went on to say:—"My first task is to see that every step is taken to trace the criminals who have committed the foul deed. I am sparing no pains to arrive at this end. The universal horror expressed makes me confident that all classes will aid the Government in bringing to justice those enemies to the country. It will be my duty fairly and without flinching to maintain and enforce the law, and thus restore confidence in those parts of the land where the life and liberty of the Queen's subjects have been endangered by the lawless acts of unprincipled men. Against these, and these only, the Government have prepared measures to supplement the power of the ordinary law. We shall, at the same time, endeavour to deal liberally with questions which, like that of arrears of rent, appear to be retarding the restoration of order. I earnestly appeal to all classes of the community, without distinction of creed or politics, to support us in our difficult task. I thank you for the sympathy which you express towards the relatives of my two dear friends. Their grief is profound, but no word of bitterness has fallen from them. My relative, Lady Frederick Cavendish, although bowed down by her irreparable loss, is animated by a spirit so noble that I take this earliest possible opportunity which has presented itself to me of making it known to the Irish nation. In a letter which I received from her two days ago, she says:—"I should be very glad if there can be any means of letting it be known in Ireland, so as to have some good effect, that I would never grudge the sacrifice of my darling's life, if only it leads to the putting down of the frightful spirit of evil in the land. He would never have grudged it if he could have hoped that his death would do more than his life. There does seem some hope of this, and you are doing all you can to keep down that most dreadful danger of panic and blind vengeance." Let these noble Christian principles be our guide at this moment of trial and anxiety. Let it be known in this country that Englishmen are determined to do justice to Ireland, and to promote her welfare with a devotion equal to, but not surpassing that which has been so tragically cut short. Then from the darkest night may arise a bright day." In the delivery of this speech Earl Spencer was deeply affected, and at certain parts of it could scarcely proceed for emotion, which was visibly shared by all present. Mr. Trevelyan also shed tears, and he was not the only one in the room who did so when the touching words of the widowed Lady Frederick Cavendish were read.

The police of Dublin have been chiefly occupied in making inquiries about the car and driver by which the four assassins escaped from Phoenix Park on the evening of Saturday, the 6th inst. It turned off to the left hand, from the main road through the Park, at the Phoenix Monument, taking the road that passes across "the Fifteen Acres" to the Park Gate in the direction of Chapelizod, a hamlet on the banks of the Liffey. The car has been traced as far as Rehobeth-lane off the South Circular Road, whence it may have gone all round the western suburbs of Dublin, outside the park, to re-enter the city on the north side. There are fifteen persons who saw a car with four persons on it driving furiously from the park and along the route which the murderers took, but they differ materially in their description of it and its occupants. Some say the back panel was green and the wheels white; others are positive that the back was red, and the wheels and underneath portion yellow; while another says he is certain the wheels were a peculiar grey. Then again the descriptions of the carman differ. When the parade was made last week none of the witnesses would go so far as to say that a driver suspected, who was before them (though he did not know it), was the man, nor would they say that he was not. The horse and car hired on the day of the assassination have also been inspected by these persons, and here, too, there is a remarkable difference of opinion between them. Most of them say the car is like that which they had seen, but they are not able to agree in identifying the horse. There is, however, an important piece of evidence obtained this week. It is stated that about three o'clock of the afternoon of Saturday, the 6th, four hours before the murders, a man who said he was a licensed carman, and that he was getting his own vehicle repaired, called at a car-owner's yard and engaged for a few hours an outside car and horse—not an unusual occurrence in Dublin when an accident befalls the car of any of the men engaged in the public carriage service. The proprietor declares that he did not know the individual who hired the car; but he gives a general description of him, which tallies closely with that in the Police Gazette. The man stated that he did not require to take cushions, as he had his own at home, and would use them. The car was brought back about half-past eight o'clock. When the driver gave up the vehicle into the custody of the owner it was noticed that the horse was covered with foam, as if it had been very hard driven, and some remarks were made on the subject, but the driver speedily got away. The car has been examined, but there are no marks of blood upon it. It is believed the murderers placed rugs over the seats, so that in the event of any blood dripping from the weapons or their clothes, the stains would not be found on the car. The detectives have a suspicion, amounting almost to a certainty, that they know the man who drove the car which was hired.

On Sunday last, an open-air meeting of Dublin car-owners and car-drivers (of which we give an illustration) was held in the Phoenix Park. About five hundred were present, Mr. Bourke was in the chair, and resolutions were passed unanimously, to the effect that they feel, "in common with the citizens of Dublin and Irishmen of every shade of religion and politics, intense horror, detestation, and condemnation of the perpetrators of the dark and demoniac crime that was committed in this beautiful park on Saturday week last, and hope that the efforts of the authorities will be soon crowned with success in capturing the assassins and bringing them to justice."

A party of divers, and of seamen from H.M.S. Belleisle, have been dragging and searching the bed of the Liffey, while the strawberry-beds on the river-banks were also searched, in hopes of finding the weapons, if they had been thrown away by the assassins in their flight. Several men have been arrested by the police, in Dublin and in other Irish towns; also at Preston and Southport, in Lancashire; at Glasgow, and at Milford Haven; but no evidence was found of their being concerned in the murders, and they were soon discharged.

The following fuller description of the assassins is now published:—"1. About thirty-three years old, stout make, dark complexion, hair, whiskers, and moustache recently clipped, so as to give a bristling appearance, narrow forehead, natural hollow or dirge on bridge of nose; wore a soft jersey hat and dark clothes.—2. About thirty years, sandy hair, whiskers and moustache, brown, faded coat, as if much exposed to sun, soft black jersey hat.—3. About twenty years, small black moustache, no whiskers, soft black hat, and dark clothes.—4. About thirty years, sandy hair and moustache, beard on chin, wore dark clothes and soft black hat. The height cannot be given of any, all being sitting on an outside car, driven by a man between thirty-five and forty years, red, bloated face, with a few days' growth of beard on, dark or brown coat, supposed fustian, and low, soft black hat. The horse was a bay or chestnut, of good action, and the car had either a dark green or red panel. The men had the appearance of sailors or well-to-do artisans."

The Government reward of £10,000, offered for information which shall lead to the conviction of the murderers, is supplemented by a reward of £500 for information leading to the arrest of any persons who may have harboured them, such persons being liable to penal servitude for life.

On Wednesday last, some expectations of an important result were excited by certain intelligence from New York. According to the correspondent of the Daily News, great excitement was caused there on Tuesday morning by a rumour that the Dublin assassins were supposed to have sailed for New York on board the steamer Scythia, at Queenstown, on Sunday, May 7. It was stated that the examination of the wounds of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke had convinced the police that the deed was committed by Irish Americans. The physicians said the wounds were inflicted with long bowie knives; and it was considered that no Irishman, unless he had been in America, would use a bowie knife at all, and that no one could use it in such a deadly and skilful manner unless familiar with it. It was also stated that all the four murderers were slouch hats such as are manufactured and worn only in America; and that the cut of their clothes and the way their whiskers were trimmed were decidedly American. The Liverpool police ascertained that four men, two of whom answered closely to the official description, had taken passage on board the Scythia. The British Minister at Washington was immediately instructed by the Foreign Office to demand of the American Government the arrest and extradition of the fugitives as soon as they landed. This demand was communicated to the American Government; and the United States marshals at New York were instructed to meet the Scythia in the bay, and make a search for the suspected assassins and secure their arrest. The United States marshals were down the bay in a Government steamer awaiting the arrival of the Scythia on Tuesday, accompanied by a revenue steamer, with orders to render all necessary aid.

The Pull Mail Gazette understands that Mr. John Morley will retire from the editorship of the Fortnightly Review in November next.

At a meeting of the Court of Common Council on Monday, it was resolved that, seven years having elapsed since a similar entertainment took place, a ball be given at the Guildhall to the principal Mayors and other municipal authorities of the United Kingdom and their ladies, and that the entertainment take place on Monday, June 19, at a cost not exceeding £2500.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The withdrawal of Quicklime from the Payne Stakes at Newmarket caused general surprise, as, on his running in the Two Thousand Guineas he could not well have been beaten; and a stake worth upwards of £1000 is not to be picked up every day. In his absence, Isabel was made favourite, but could only finish a good third to Little Sister and Executor, who ran a dead-heat. Lord Falmouth's filly appeared likely to win easily at the distance, but was stopping fast in the last few strides, and Executor just managed to reach her. Still, the form does not look very grand, and neither of them are at all fancied for the Derby. Wild Arab was in great demand for the Newmarket Two-Year-Old Plate, but, like many juveniles on the occasion of their first appearance, ran very raw and green, and had to be contented with third place to Maria II. and Minnehaha, the latter being second for about the fifth time in succession. On the Thursday, there was an interesting match between Petticoat and Sorrellina, in which the former just failed to concede 14 lb. Eastern Express (9 st. 5 lb.) made very light of her big weight in the Flying Handicap; and old Cradle (9 st. 5 lb.) began his career in Sir George Chetwynd's colours by winning a selling race over his favourite five furlongs. The Second Spring Two-Year-Old Stakes produced a grand finish between Hauteur and Minnehaha, and it was sheer gameness which gave the former a head victory. Minnie was backed against the field for the Exning Plate, and ought to have won, but, finishing in jady fashion, was just beaten by Father Prout, who is a son of Jolly Friar, a horse that was never trained owing to an accident, but has been lucky in securing a good deal of patronage from breeders.

There is not likely to be a very large field for the Derby, which will be decided next Wednesday, and the following may be found a tolerably correct list of the starters and jockeys:—Bruce (Morden), Shotover (Cannon), Quicklime (C. Wood), Pursebearer (J. Osborne), Marden (Wyatt), Gerild (F. Webb), Dutch Oven (Archer), Fenelon (Watts), Executor (Goater), Gareth (Lemaire), Berwick (Rossiter), Comte Alfred (Loates), Laureate (Fordham), and Southampton (Wainwright). Several of the ragged division are sure to swell the field, but only the fourteen we have enumerated can be counted upon with any degree of certainty. The unlucky accident which happened to Kingdom last week will probably prevent a much-fancied candidate from taking part in the race, and everything really seems plain sailing for Bruce, who, however, even now, is scarcely so good a favourite as he ought to be. We doubt if Shotover is a genuine stayer, and Quicklime and Pursebearer may prove the most dangerous opponents to Mr. Rymill's unbeaten colt. It will be very interesting to see St. Marguerite, Shotover, and Nellie, who ran such a close finish for the One Thousand, fight their battle over again in the Oaks; but, on last year's form, Geheimnis should prove too good for any of the trio.

Last Friday week the famous Adventurer died very suddenly at the Sheffield-lane Paddocks. As a racehorse he was never quite first class; but he soon earned the highest honours at the stud, and year after year his name has been very high up on the list of winning sires. Perhaps little Wheel of Fortune was the very best of his numerous offspring; and he can also lay claim to such good performers as Pretender, Apology, Adventurière, Ruperra, Glen Arthur, Bul Gal, and "lesser lights."

Though the cricket season is supposed to begin on May Day, or even a little earlier, nothing much was done until Monday last, when three great matches were started simultaneously. At the time of writing, only one of these is finished—that between the M.C.C. and Ground and Lancashire, in which the champion county suffered defeat by eight wickets. This result was mainly due to the fine batting of Barnes (119) and the very effective bowling of Flowers. Mr. Porter (57) was the top scorer for Lancashire, as Mr. Hornby did not "come off" in either innings, but before long he will doubtless show in his old form again. The Australians v. Oxford University was chiefly remarkable for the batting of Mr. Massie, who played a magnificent innings of 206. We shall revert to this match next week.

The meeting of tricyclists, postponed from the 29th ult. in consequence of the severe storm and rain, came off on Saturday last, in the most satisfactory manner, the weather being charming, whilst the muster was largely in excess of the most sanguine expectations. The total present was about 500, and in this number there were twenty-eight ladies on sociables, and one little girl.

EPPS'S CHOCOLATE ESSENCE.
If cocoa seeds as imported are roasted, then broken up into "nibs"—small pieces—and subjected to very high pressure in an hydraulic press, they give out a large percentage of their oil or butter, which is removed, and the remaining constituents of the nibs fall into a powder—Chocolate Essence. This absolute cocoa is left unsweetened. It possesses an alluring principle or alkaloid to that contained in tea or coffee. Boiled for a few minutes, it affords a beverage of a coffee-like consistency. Unaffected by climate. Each packet (old or 1c.) or tin (old, 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 3s. 6d., or 7s. 6d.) is labelled "James Epps and Co., Homeopathic Chemists, 48, Throgmorton-street; and 170, Piccadilly."

will at once arrest them, and cure severe cases in half an hour. Sold by all Chemists. 2s. 6d. a Bottle. Address, Dr. Dunbar, care of Messrs. F. Newbery and Sons, 1, King Edward-st., E.C.

THROAT AFFECTIONS and HOARSENESS.—All suffering from Irritation of the Throat and Hoarseness will be agreeably surprised at the almost immediate relief afforded by the use of BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES. These famous "lozenges" are sold by all respectable Chemists in this country, at 1s. 10d. per Box. People troubled with a "hacking cough," a "slight cold," or bronchial affections cannot try them too soon, as similar troubles, if allowed to progress, result in serious Pulmonary and Asthmatic affections.

THROW PHYSIC TO THE DOGS.

A correspondent writes to ask me which I consider the best medicine for a "confirmed dyspeptic subject" to "induce in." My dear Sir, or Madam (I don't know which it is, for only initials have been used as a signature), I am not a doctor, neither do I profess to know anything at all about the British Pharmacopoeia. When advised to take this or that nostrum for any little ailment, I always quote Shakespeare, "Throw physic to the dogs; I'll none of it." And I would say the same to my present interlocutor. ENO'S FRUIT SALT is the only thing in the way of medicine I indulge in; and though it may sound something like a puff, yet I find that it is all I require to keep me in health, provided I also remember Dr. Paul's advice to be temperate in all things.—Victorian World, Feb. 25, 1882, "Notes on Men and Things."

CAUTION.—Legal rights are protected in every civilized country. Examine each bottle, and see the capsule is marked "Eno's Fruit Salt." Without it, you have been imposed on by worthless imitations. Sold by all Chemists. Price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. Directions in sixteen languages how to prevent disease. Protected in every country. Prepared only at Eno's Fruit Salt Works, Hatfield, London, S.E., by J.C. Eno's Patent.

BIARRITZ PREFERABLE to PAU and

THE RIVIERA.—A mild climate, with radiant sun, neither frost nor snow. Unequalled bathing in a sea warmed by the Gulf stream. Biarritz, by its soil and altitude, permits of rapid infiltration of all surface water, and its beautiful sandy shores are not polluted, or the sea made the receptacle for the town sewage, as is the case in some towns where fever has been fatal this winter.

Biarritz has had no epidemic or typhoid during the winter, and upwards of 3000 English visitors have hibernated, being an excess of 500 over any other season.

Biarritz has a pure air, many degrees warmer than Pau—at which latter the snow-clad mountains serve as a refrigerator, the air is humid, and rheumatism and heart oppression are frequent.

Biarritz is the winter town of the future—already more English winter there than at Cannes. Biarritz is a town where the most distinguished classes of society meet to renew their health, or while away the dreary months of winter. To which intent there are all the necessary attractions—clubs, lawn tennis, fox-hunting, pigeon-shooting, horse-racing, theatre, casino, balls, concerts, music, English doctors of ability, as also French of great renown, English chemists, bank, church, library, provision stores, house agency, and an English Consulate.

Three grand hotels, and others equally good, and the Hotel-Palais of Villa Eugénie, where one can sleep, breakfast, dine, or sup, in the imperial apartments. Biarritz is twenty-four hours from London via Calais and Paris, and weekly steamers via Bordeaux. Biarritz is twenty minutes from Bayonne by rail, and near Spanish frontier.

BIARRITZ.—VILLA EUGÉNIE HOTEL and RESTAURANT. Superior Class. Grand apartments and chambers, with every luxury. Table-d'Hôte. Restaurant, Café, Club, Casino, and Concert every evening. Billiards, Gymnastics, Lawn-Tennis. Large ornamental Garde-Parade surrounded by pine wood. Bathing on the magnificent sands. Fine winter climate. Mr. CALMEL, Proprietor of the Grand Hotel du Lucien, at Lucien, is the Director of the Palais Biarritz.

MONACO.—THE SUMMER BATHING

SEASON IS NOW OPEN.

The Sea Baths of Monaco are completely protected from the north winds, and the most healthful and enjoyable on the Mediterranean Coast.

The Grand Hotel des Bains, upon the seashore, contains most comfortable and luxurious apartments for families at moderate prices.

Hot and Cold Salt and Fresh Water Baths, and Hydropathic Establishment. Tropical vegetation abounds, yet the temperature is always cooled by the cool sea breezes.

MONACO is situated about 35 minutes from Nice, and 20 minutes from Mentone, and vies with either town for its sanitary arrangements and healthful climate.

NAPLES-BY-THE-SEA.—See Naples as it should be seen, from the Balconies of the HOTEL ROYAL DES ETIRANS, overlooking the Gulf of High Life, and always open. Views and Prices on application to Mr. CAPRANI, now the Sole Proprietor.

THE LATE PRINCESS WILHELM OF WURTEMBERG.

The family of her Royal Highness Princess Helen, Duchess of Albany, in the very week of her happy marriage at Windsor, suffered a sad bereavement, which suddenly interrupted the sojourn of her parents in England, compelling them to depart hence for Germany on the third day after the Royal Wedding. Princess Wilhelm of Wurtemberg, an elder sister of the Duchess of Albany, died from the effects of childbirth, at Ludwigsburg, near Stuttgart, on Sunday, the 30th ult., and most unexpectedly, as she had been considered to be in a favourable condition on the Saturday evening. She was Princess Marie, one of the daughters of Prince George Victor, reigning Sovereign of Waldeck-Pyrmont, and of his wife, Princess Helen Wilhelmina Henrietta, whose position and connections in Germany, and those of the small territory ruled by his Serene Highness, were recently described in this Journal. The other married sisters are espoused, respectively, to the Hereditary Prince (Crown Prince) of Bentheim, to the King of the Netherlands, and lastly to his Royal Highness the Duke of Albany; one sister, Princess Sophia, died unmarried at Torquay; and the remaining sister, Princess Elizabeth, is not yet of age. Princess Georgina Henrietta Marie, whose death is now mourned, was born on May 23, 1857, and in 1877 married Prince Wilhelm, nephew to the King of Wurtemberg, and heir-presumptive to the Crown, being the son of the King's sister, Catherine, who married a cousin, Prince Friedrich of Wurtemberg. The King and Queen of Wurtemberg have no children.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Molsberger and Christmann, of Arolsen, Waldeck.

THE LATE PRINCESS WILHELM OF WURTEMBERG,
SISTER TO THE DUCHESS OF ALBANY.

OUR FEATHERED FRIENDS. THEIR NESTS.

In the flowery month of May, when every passing shower leaves the fresh green lanes and woodlands fresher still and greener than before, so full of rapture is the singing of the birds and so infinitely tender are their varied warblings—we can readily believe that "all this waste of music is the voice of love." The nesting season is in full swing. A few, indeed, of our resident birds have not only built their nests and laid their eggs, but are tending with patient care their young ones. Most of our feathered friends, however, especially the migratory birds, wait until vegetation is sufficiently dense to hide from too curious eyes their small abodes of love. May is the great month for nests. Not only is vegetation rapidly thickening, but the last of our summer birds of passage have now arrived.

What infinite variety there is in the nests of birds!—in the style of building, as well as in the sites chosen. What wonderfully snug little edifices they are, most of them, and how skilful the workmanship of the architects, who in their own sweet simple fashion are miners, masons, carpenters, weavers, and basket-makers!

Of the mining birds, or burrowers, one of the best-known in this country is the delicate little sand-martin. Soon after their arrival in April, we find them in large colonies hard at work in quarries and sand-pits, and on the banks or escarpments facing a river, boring with their tiny bills the galleries, or tunnels, that are to serve as their summer residences. These tunnels, which average about two feet and a half in length, invariably slope gently upward, to allow for drainage. A little loose straw, with some feathers, at the farthest extremity of the gallery, is all the nest they make. Another miner, whose haunts are where limpid streams steal murmuringly through sequestered woody banks, is the resplendent kingfisher. This solitary bird, whose unsocial habits of life differ as much from the sand-martins as does his iridescent plumage from their sober brown and white, is said sometimes to save himself the trouble of burrowing by usurping the hole of a water-shrew or of a water-rat.

Among the mason-birds—those which use mortar for their nests—the swallow and the house-martin are the most familiar. Very interesting it is to watch the latter at work on the walls of our houses and above our bed-room windows. How careful the small architects are not to build too much at a time, and so bring down the nest by its own weight before the mortar is sufficiently hardened. The shell of their little tenement is formed of earth, tempered and wrought together by tiny bits of straw or grass, layer by layer, about half an inch a day. In ten or a dozen days their mud or clay built home is ready for them—a hemispheric nest, with a small aperture or door towards the top, and lined inside with feathers. The nuthatch—a far rarer bird than the beautiful house-martin, or window-swallow as it is often called—is also a mason. It is an inhabitant of the woods, building its nest in the hole of a tree. And the two best-known of our song-birds, the thrush and the blackbird, are to a certain extent masons, lining as they do the inside of their twig-encircled nests with a kind of mortar: the blackbird uses mud, and spreads it in a much thicker layer than the thrush—the dried mud being covered with very fine grass.

The little nuthatch, in addition to being a mason, is partly a carpenter; for, when it cannot find a convenient hole in a tree, it will look out for some worm-eaten part of the trunk, and hew out for itself an excavation with its bill. And the woodpecker, of which the green and the spotted varieties are the commonest in our country, not only bores into the bark of trees in search of insects, but chisels out holes for its rough and rather uncomfortable-looking nest—crumbled wood-stuff being all that the eggs are laid upon. The wryneck, too, makes its rough nest of decayed wood-dust, and the gaily-dressed tomtit and the little marsh-tit their snuggler moss-built dwellings, in the holes of trees.

But the nest of the sprightly tomtit is a slovenly contrivance compared with that of the long-tailed tit, whose wonderful little domicile is, perhaps, the most beautiful of all the beautiful little homes found in hedge, bush, or tree; and it is there, among the twigs and branches of shrubs and trees, that the most exquisite workmanship is displayed in the nests of birds. The nest of the long-tailed tit is domed, with a tiny hole for ingress and egress: its outer walls are made chiefly of the greenest moss, and inside it is lined with a mass of softest down—the delicate structure taking the little owners quite a fortnight to build.

Almost rivalling, in beauty of construction, the hollow ball of the long-tailed tit, are the exquisitely neat and compact little nests of the chaffinch and the goldfinch. The gay and merry chaffinch, conscious, perhaps, of its attractive plumage, assimilates as much as possible the outer colouring of its nest to the surroundings. The nest is built either in a tree-fork or in a bush or hedge, its outer framework being constructed of tree moss and lichens, next which comes a layer, beautifully woven together, of wool, moss, grass, and, perhaps, the threads of a spider's web, then a lining of closely woven hair, and lastly a bed of down. Quite as beautiful, and very similar in its appearance and mode of structure, is the nest of the goldfinch; but the goldfinch's is shallower, the outside mosses are more deeply woven into the walls, and, instead of being placed, like that of the chaffinch, in the fork of a bough, is generally near the end of a horizontal branch. The greenfinch's, too, is a very pretty nest, and so is the linnet's; indeed, all the finches are remarkably neat and dexterous in their workmanship. The linnet and the greenfinch have a basket-work of roots and small twigs surrounding the moss, wool, and hair with which they build the interior.

And what a charming bower Jenny Wren builds for herself!—often little else than a mass of green moss, with a smooth bed of the finer sort for a lining. But how skilfully the great pile of moss—it seems such a pile for so tiny a builder—is woven into the compact and shapely-domed edifice—often painfully noticeable, in spite of all her efforts at concealment, on the mossy banks and in the tangled brakes she loves so dearly. But who would touch her pretty nest, or pry too closely into her secrets?—sweet bird, she easily betrays her nesting site, for all the time the birds are building they are singing. And could anything be more exquisitely neat and lovely than the round mossy nest, domed like the wren's, of that still more diminutive bird—the smallest indeed of all our British birds—the goldcrest? The nest of this tiny creature is most frequently found suspended to the drooping end of a fir-bough.

Most of the warblers—the nightingale, for example—build somewhat untidy homes for themselves; untidy, that is to say, compared with some of the paragons of beauty above mentioned. Basket-making is the art they most excel in. The deep nest of the reed-warbler is so cleverly built into the three or four reeds which support it that, however the winds may blow, even when the reeds are bent so as nearly to touch the water, the nest is perfectly secure. Of the basket-making birds, the nests of the jay, missel-thrush, and bullfinch are fair specimens.

W. OAK RIND.

A special concert was given at the Royal Victoria Hall on Monday evening in aid of the Church of England temperance demonstrations, which are given there every Friday evening. There was an evening concert on Wednesday in aid of the "Princess Frederica's Convalescent Home," given by Clement Hoey, Esq., under the immediate patronage of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, the Duke and Duchess of Albany, Princess Christian, Princess Frederica of Hanover, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and numerous patronesses. The Thursday ballad concert was given by Miss Florence Waud. The last ballad concert given this season by the Popular Ballad Concert Committee, at the Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell, takes place this (Saturday) evening. The concert has been arranged by, and will be given under the direction of, Mr. G. F. Bambridge. Miss Hope Glenn and other well-known vocalists and instrumentalists will take part in it.

THE PARIS SALON. SECOND NOTICE.

Many of the pictures which are regarded as the successes of this year's Salon have been painted entirely out of doors; and the general tendency of French landscape art, it will be observed, is towards this open-air effect. To the eye, hitherto accustomed to mere studio-manufacture, pictures of this stamp have at first glance a pale, washed-out effect; but the moment it has become familiarised with the light colour-scheme of the artist whose studio-ceiling is the open sky, its truth to nature becomes at once a conviction.

The leading apostles of this new school, which has been growing in strength and in numbers during the last four or five years, have for their watchword, light and breadth, with such loyalty to foreground details as may be characterised as being suggestive rather than prosaically realistic, and the drawing of grasses, flowers, and shrubs as being rather felt than expressed.

Bastien-Lepage, a recognised chief in this style, whose "Joan of Arc" of two seasons back was followed last year by his no less famous "Mendicant," which Londoners were so much charmed with in the French Gallery, is no less adequately represented this year by "Le Père Jacques" (127), an old man in a dark jacket, stooping with a bundle of sticks on his shoulders while his little companion, in pale-blue frock, gathers some of the wild flowers which grow in the glade. In the same open-air manner P. E. Mangeant has attempted to render "The Return of the Prodigal Son." We see him kneeling in the foreground with his back to us, nearly naked, while the old father, midway between us and the distant homestead, approaches, followed by his dog. Under such circumstances we should have imagined the dog would have preceded his master. The picture is chiefly remarkable for the quaintness of its treatment. A more satisfactory exponent of the school is L. B. Harrison, of Philadelphia, whose girl raking up the brown "November" leaves (1304) has been bought by the French Government. His other contribution of girls in white plucking the field-flowers as they return from their "First Communion" (1305) is very bright and cheerful. His brother, who has also two pictures, is, in the matter of quality, a little less pronounced.

One who also works face to face with nature, who is rather stimulated than biased by such men as Pelouse and Bastien-Lepage, is M. Jameson, whose "Sardine Washers" (1402), coming across the sands with their baskets is specially pleasing, not only from the comely aspect of the foremost girl, but from the simple way in which all the figures blend with the landscape. This same blending is peculiarly characteristic of the school. It is true Victor Binet has given us a great green hill-side, with a slight break in his grey sky, without any figures at all; but other men, equally conspicuous, distinguish themselves by the happy manner alluded to.

The girl, for example, under the apple-tree watching two geese (1309), by L. Welden-Hawkins, of Stuttgart, in which the drawing of the reeds in the immediate foreground is so beautifully felt, and his "Le Lavoir de Grès" (1308) deserve a medal; and still more emphatically, perhaps, would we predicate this in the case of the two pictures painted by William Stott, of Oldham. In the one called "The Ferryman" (2496) we see two little peasant girls in pale blue—a colour very much affected by the school, but at the same time in perfect accordance with the costume of the country—watching on the hither side of the river the starting of the ferry-boat, which is dimly seen under the further bank, the quiet glow beyond the cottage tops betokening the approach of evening. The other picture (2497)—boys bathing from a boat in a sedgy stream, which in one corner gives back vividly the blue of heaven—is a work that ought to command the very highest honours of the Salon. In the "Rêverie" (2025) of Franck O'Méara the artist shows a graceful lady meditating on the banks of a lake over which a full autumn moon is rising. Here the artist partly fails, because he has ignored the canons of the school and attempted the ideal instead of evolving it in a natural way from the simply real. There is no pathos like bald, plain fact. As a successful example of how simple nature, when judiciously treated, may be suggestive of the ideal, we would point to Raphael Collin's "Idylle" (618)—two lovers under an apple-tree. W. A. Coffin, whose portrait is on the line. C. H. Davis, Robert Hincley, and D. R. Knight are all of the United States.

White, which in anything like quantity or mass is always so difficult to treat in a composition, has been brilliantly bent to his purpose by Hugo Salmon in his procession of "Picardy Girls Going to their First Communion" (2392). They are accompanied by a sister and headed by a lady in black, which he has cunningly prevented from becoming a spot. But white on white is still more difficult, and several artists have essayed the feat triumphantly. We would point to the small picture of the young man rowing his sweetheart (2575) as an example. The whole thing is in various shades of white, and it is astonishing how he has differentiated the values. The picture is in a sunk frame of deep blue velvet, and the effect is simply charming. In the matter of frames the Salon gives much more liberty than our Academy, and the result is that the individuality of the artist has much greater play. The painter of this is Jan Van Beers, to whom we owe "The Siren," a young lady coming down the steps of a jetty to the cutter's gig waiting below, and which created such admiration in last year's Salon, and occupies so prominent a position in the present Royal Academy.

But to show that the Salon is not immaculate, although its administration is entirely in the hands of artists, this same Van Beers, whose picture just mentioned is deservedly on the line, sent another work, a small miniature of a lady in pale blue, which he calls "Lily" (2576); and will it be believed that this exquisite little work—for Van Beers is a master—is hung ten feet high, and cannot be seen without the aid of a magnifier? The story goes that in a fit of pardonable anger he rubbed the glass of the picture all over with black, and by so doing incurred the grave displeasure of the authorities. Another fine example of the masterly treatment of masses of white will be found in the "Dancing Girl" (625), of Leon Comerre, a pupil of Cabanel.

Walter Ullmann's "Autumn Day" (2563), is one of the noticeable landscapes of the exhibition, the two lovers as well as the scene itself, reminding us a little of our own George Boughton; and so is the low, vivid sunset on the edge of a lonely moor (1752), by Paul Malièvre. We have marked for special approval also a very small picture of a girl resting by a stream (1993), where she has been cutting sedges, by Mlle. Bertha Newcombe; and a large canvas of a wide glen silvery with the "Dew of Autumn" (2379). The author is Henri Saintin. He and Segé, Loir, Hareux, and their fellows, may well be left to represent French landscape art, while English may be fully trusted to such men as we have mentioned, adding the names of Thompson, Waterlow, and Reid.

Most of the pictures thus far commended beyond more or less to the school we have described at the beginning of this article; but there is an extreme section of it who are "impressionists" pure and simple, and its prophet is Edouard Manet. His barmaid, in blue, surrounded by glasses and champagne bottles, standing ready to serve you in front of a looking glass, in which not only is her own back reflected, but the whole crowd of the frequenters of the Folies Bergères (1753), looks at first sight most painty, bewildering, and rough; but at the proper distance it comes fairly well together. The barmaid is life-size. There is much in a name; and were not this artist called an impressionist, I am doubtful if he would have a place on the line. With his other contribution, a portrait, we are altogether pleased.

No less extravagant in handling is the great gipsy picture of John S. Sargent, only it is the handling of a man of a much loftier artistic temperament, who has shown, too, by his portrait of a lady in a black dress holding out a white rose (2398) that he can tame at will the bravura of his brush, and give it the most finished guidance in every turn. This, indeed, is one of the portraits of the exhibition, and takes rank with the magnificent "Lady Dalhousie" (483) of Carolus Duran. The latter stands her height in a dress of rich tawny orange colour, holding a bouquet in one hand, and some loose flower leaves in the other, and behind is a great piece of drapery of deep red. There is nothing more telling and brilliant in the way of portraiture in the whole exhibition. This artist's "Entombment of Christ" (482) is also a very powerful work, and suggestive of an old master, if that means praise.

In the Salon Carré at the end of the galleries to the left, as one enters, is one of those great sombre canvases which one scarcely knows whether to admire or not. It is called "Ines de Castro," 1578, and is, from its subject, like several other pictures in the exhibition, somewhat repellent. Don Pedro, son of Alphonso the Fourth of Portugal, loved and married secretly the beautiful Ines de Castro; but, at the instigation of his courtiers, the King had her assassinated. But when Don Pedro came to the throne, he had her exhumed, and, attiring her in all the insignia of Royalty, he placed her on the throne, and compelled his courtiers to do her obeisance and hail her as their Queen. This is the act the painter has represented, and not without a certain grim dramatic power; but one can scarcely give one's suffrages to a subject whose central figure is a corpse, royally bedizened.

In the same room with Ines de Castro is a remarkably clever work, in two compartments, called "Irreconcilables" (2075), by Fernand Pelez. In one compartment stands a little patrician, richly dight, against a golden background, characteristically holding in his hand a whip; while in the other, against a grey background, we see a tattered little street Arab, grimy and defiant. Murillo never painted a truer ragsman than this. In the same room is a very delicately-treated "Virgin" (2449), by A. Séon, a pupil of Puvion de Chavannes. Attired in pale blue, she sits against a curtain of a darker shade of the same colour, while the infant Christ stands at her side, and she contemplates thoughtfully the little St. John, who, seated on the floor, holds up a toy cross. Louis Matout, in his big picture of Christ (1803), has rather misread the text. It was not half-grown lads, but little children, whom Our Saviour blessed, and said "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

The great square room at the other end is adorned with the biggest canvas in the exhibition. It is divided; one compartment representing Sacred Music, showing a rapt girl playing an organ, to which angels sing, and the other a group of nude nymphs dallying on the steps of a bath, the foremost figure lying her full length, as if about to tumble lazily into the water; while aloft, immediately under a great brazen sphinx, a male figure plays on a long flute. This grand diptych is by G. Dubufe, and, from the architectural background in both compartments, it is doubtless intended for some large hall. It is brilliantly drawn and painted.

In the same room is a marvellously spirited picture of a "Horse Market in Poland" (371), by the famous artist Joseph Brandt, showing a gathering of semi-Oriental-looking tents, with clouds of dust, and with groups of horses as wild and intractable as that to which Mazeppa was tied. Poland is well represented in the exhibition, and the names of Szyndler, Sredomsky, Sredomsky, Chelmonski, Bakalowicz, are to be mentioned as men honouring at once art and their country. The Bohemian artist, Brozik, flanks the American Bridgman's magnificent "Roumanian Deme" (390), with two historic canvases of a high order. Among other works in this room claiming special notice at the hands of the visitor, not only on its own merits, but because it represents a class of works peculiarly French, is the "Old Garden Paling" (249), of Gustave Bienvêtu, in front of which we behold a magnificent growth of rhododendrons and other large flowers. A bit of old paling is nothing in itself, but it becomes wonderfully sublimed when treated by a real artist. In like manner, René Goussé makes a magnificent composition out of a few roses, irises, a great vase, and a piece of tapestry (1205). Here is a good picture made out of white and lilac coloured flowers and a bundle of asparagus (2535), by Gabriel Thurner, and there "Le cellier du père Jacquemin" (2525) is glorified into a salon by the way in which C. A. Thomas has set forth the prawns and mussels with which it is stored. Of compositions in armour, jewellery, gold and silver plate, and all matters of bric-à-brac, there are many fine, and some noble examples.

But our space is already more than occupied, and such artists as Courtois, with his "Bayadère" (674); Albert Maignan, with his "Sleep of Fra Angelico" (1738), with the Angel painting on his work; the Beniers, Reginald Bottomley, with whose "Maternity" we were much pleased, the Flandrins, the Fleuryrs; and Jean Paul Laurens, with his powerfully painted "Last Moments of the Emperor Maximilian"; and a host of others, must be left unnoticed.

In the sculpture garden, the place of honour occupied by Lord Ronald Gower's monument to Shakespeare last season is this year filled by Ernest Louis Barrias with a grand heroic group commemorative of the "Defence of St. Quentin" (4083). The figure of civil France with the spinning-wheel behind her, standing her height, fronting the foe, with her protecting arm unroed a falling soldier, is conceived and carried out in the noblest spirit. Nor is a similar group by Antony Mercié (4650), in which the allegorical female figure clutches a dead soldier by the waist, while she holds aloft his rifle, much behind it in spirit.

This intense patriotic feeling, invariably identified with revolution, is as patent this year as ever, both in the department of sculpture and of painting, and several of the works bought by Government commemorate revolutionary incidents. There are no fewer than four colossal statues of "Camille-Desmoulins" giving the signal of liberty in the Palais-Royal in 1789, and each has its merits, although we have no space here to differentiate them.

In portraiture the bronze busts of Paul Baudry, by Paul Dubois (4324), and the red-clay bust of Saint-Marceaux (4834), we choose out among the many as representative works; while in the region of the imaginative, Alexander Falguière's "Diana," who has just let her arrow go, as one can see by the bone and muscle modelling of the back as well as the play of the fingers, and is in the act of looking towards her quarry, with a supreme curl of the lip, may well represent what France can do in purely creative art. The blending in this figure of the realistic and the ideal, if the term may be allowed, at once attracts the attention, and calls forth the admiration of every appreciative beholder. J. F. R.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES. HISTORY OF CUSTOMS AND BELIEFS.

Dr. Edward B. Tylor, F.R.S., in his fourth and concluding lecture, given on Tuesday, the 9th inst., considered the rather abstruse problem of discovering the means, ideas, and institutions in early growth, from remains of higher culture. He referred to the evident rise of the Hottentots in civilisation, of which the names given by them to the numerals was adduced as an example. As an instance of degradation, the belief of the South Sea Islanders that there are a number of skies one above another was traced up through the notion of there being several heavens, current in India and Greece, derived originally from the Babylonian astronomy. Reference was then made to the piece of wood which produces a loud whizzing sound when whirled rapidly in the air employed by the native Australians to warn away women and children when they were about to engage in their sacred mysteries, such as the initiation of a boy into the rights of manhood. This custom also existed in the ceremonies of the mysteries of the worship of Dionysos or Bacchus. Comments were then made on the early conceptions of nature, the personification of the various powers, such as the sun and wind, and the imputation to them of human passions which were to be gratified or appeased. The ancient tradition of the Cimbric fighting with the tides of the sea was commented on, and allusion was made to the expression in Hamlet "To take arms against a sea of troubles." Remarks were then made on the doctrine of animism, that the soul is the only cause of life, and may go in and out of the body, and also on the belief of the natives of British Guiana that there is no difference between dreams and realities.

THE ALKALINE METALS.

Professor Dewar, M.A., F.R.S., devoted his fourth lecture, given on Thursday, the 11th inst., to experimental illustrations of the production and properties of the first of a series of groups of the metals, which included potassium, sodium, lithium, rubidium, and cesium; first obtained from their salts by electrolysis, or the powerful decomposing agency of the Voltaic battery, which no compound can resist. Some of them may be also obtained by amalgamation; but are then liable to be alloyed with mercury. Sodium was obtained in large quantities by reduction by means of carbon and chalk, by Deville, when required by him as an agent in the production of aluminium. These metals are very light, easily fusible, malleable, and silvery white in colour. From their great oxidisability (taking fire on contact with moisture) potassium and sodium are kept in naphtha and lithium in rock oil. Their specific heat and atomic weights conform to the law proposed by Mendeleeff. The coloured flames of some of them were shown; that of lithium, under certain conditions, being intensely crimson. A combination of potassium and sodium forms the only alloy hitherto known to be liquid at ordinary temperatures. The solution of potassium in the gas ammonia in the Voltaic arc producing a dark blue liquid was a very remarkable experiment. The vapours of potassium and sodium were described as resembling iodine in some respects. The latter part of the lecture was devoted to illustrations of the spectra of the alkaline metals, pieces of them being fused and vapourised in the electric furnace formed by magnesia in the Voltaic arc, the production and absorption of the bright yellow band by sodium being specially considered.

RELATIVE VALUE OF DIFFERENT MODES OF LIGHTING.

Mr. A. G. Vernon Harcourt, F.R.S., Lee's Reader in Chemistry at Oxford, one of the Metropolitan Gas Referees, gave the discourse at the evening meeting on the 12th inst. He began by commenting on the merits of different kinds of candles and lamps, of which fine specimens were exhibited. Taking the cost of the light of twenty-five sperm candles at 9'43d. per hour, Mr. Harcourt stated that the cost for the same amount of light would be, by Palmitine candles, 3'73d.; stearine candles, 5'3d.; composites, 4'02d.; Duplex lamps, burning Alexandra oil, 0'48d.; Simplex, 0'53d.; Silber's, 0'49d.; Moderator (Colza oil), 1'38d. Gas-burners: London Argand, 0'28d.; Silber's, 0'27d.; Sugg's, 0'26d.; Siemens, 0'19d. The Parliamentary standard light of one sperm candle, six to the pound, varying according to the material and diameter, Mr. Harcourt devised a fixed standard by a mixture of paraffin, &c., which he exhibited. After explaining various modes of estimating and comparing the degrees of light given by different materials invented by Rumford, Bunsen, and others, he illustrated his own photometric method. The loss of light by the use of opal shades was estimated at about 27 per cent, and that by ground-glass shades at 14'7 per cent. The principle of Professor Faraday's gas-burner, in which the products of combustion are conveyed away, and that of other new burners, was explained and illustrated. The latter part of the lecture was devoted to experimental illustrations of the methods employed in the production of the electric light, by the Voltaic battery and by magneto-electric and dynamo machines; and the principles involved in the construction of the incandescent lamps of Swan and Edison were explained. The methods suggested by Professor Ayrton for estimating the value of electric light by calculating the amount of energy obtained by horse-power were explained and illustrated.

HISTORY OF THE SCIENCE OF POLITICS.

Mr. Frederick Pollock, M.A., LL.D., gave his fourth and concluding lecture on Saturday last, the 13th inst. He began with remarks on the great development of political science in the present century, specially relating to the theories of the State, of constitution and government, of legislative and positive law, and the State in its external relations. He then discussed the doctrines of Bentham, the father of systematic legislation, who, in his "Fragment on Government," defines political society as habitual obedience to certain governors. Law is equal to the command of the Sovereign, whose duty it is to make laws. The power of the State is to be guided by utility, "the greatest happiness of the greatest number." Bentham's power was great in ethics. In the works of Austin we have a complete separation of the theory of Sovereignty from the ethics of politics, and the pure science of positive law. Remarks were then made on efficient practical power in certain constitutions; such as corporate sovereignties, single assemblies, majorities, combined assemblies, and the British Constitution. At the present time the House of Commons is practically supreme. The Continental school was described as not totally opposed to the English, being ethical and historical, and not more dogmatic. Some writers of the historical and philosophical schools were then considered, including Coleridge, Bluntschli, Comte, and Spencer. In regard to the question of the limits of the State, reference was made to the doctrines of Wilhelm von Humboldt, who at first opposed education by the State, and adopted by J. Stuart Mill and others, termed minimizers—a doctrine termed by Huxley "administrative nihilism." In regard to this question, Mr. Pollock went back to Aristotle. The "minimizers" assert that the State is founded merely for protection. Aristotle asserts that it exists, not only that men may live, but live well. Huxley says "Government is the corporate reason of the community."

THE MAGAZINES FOR MAY.

SECOND NOTICE.

The Cornhill's new serials, "Damocles" and "No New Thing," continue in the same style as they were commenced. They are both fair pictures of not over-interesting social conditions; with real graphic power which would have been better bestowed on more attractive subjects. The portrait of the worthless Marescalchi, in "No New Thing," is singularly lifelike, but the effect is unpleasing. "The Foreigner at Home" is a Scotchman in England, who seems disposed to subscribe to the first clause only of his traditional countryman's verdict on the English—"They have no muckle sense, but they're an unco braw people to live amang." "The Convent of Monte Oliveto" is one of Mrs. Symonds's picturesque sketches of Italy. It is probably owing to the writer's absence from England that the name of the Sienese artist Razzi is regularly printed Bazzi. Mr. Proctor criticises Dr. Siemens's theory of solar energy, which Mr. Karl Blind illustrates in another department by resolving the Nibelung epic into a solar myth.

The most interesting paper in Fraser is Mr. Ashcroft Noble's summary of the contents of the Pre-Raphaelite magazine, The Germ, which only lived through four numbers, but will always remain a landmark in intellectual history as the signal of "a new departure" in art and literature. The extreme scarcity of the periodical renders Mr. Noble's impartial and discriminating analysis particularly acceptable. Out of the fulness of his knowledge of the period of Charles I., Mr. S. R. Gardiner easily convicts the author of "John Inglesant" of several inaccuracies; but he does not show that the romance is unfaithful to the spirit of the age delineated. "The Lady Maud" is continued with its usual spirit, and Miss Betham-Edwards's pleasant novelette concluded. The most attractive of the other papers are a narrative of a visit to the Queen of Burmah, and Mr. Dennis's genial chat on Charles Lamb and his circle, apropos of Mr. Ainger's recent volume.

The Fortnightly opens with a thoughtful paper, by Mr. Leadam, on the expediency of introducing substitutes for trial by jury into Ireland. The writer's conclusion, supported by an array of citations from evidence given on previous occasions, is in favour of ordinary juries under special commissions. He seems to forget, however, that the qualification of jurymen has been seriously lowered since the periods to which his quotations refer. Prince Kropotkin's defence of the Russian revolutionary party is not unsuccessful in arousing sympathy for the youths and maidens who have devoted themselves to the propagation of Nihilism, but at the same time affords an apology for the repressive measures which, as he asserts, have driven them to acts of violence. According to his own showing, the creed which they claimed the liberty of preaching was a Socialism which the Russian Government could not be expected to tolerate. Signor Gallenga gives an interesting account of the present political condition of Finland, the only part of the Russian empire in the enjoyment of a Constitution, which, unfortunately, the bad understanding between the Finnish and the Swedish inhabitants places in peril. Mr. Myers's review of the character of Marcus Aurelius is elegant and discriminating.

The Contemporary Review has two articles on Ireland—one by Professor Goldwin Smith, the other by Mr. N. W. A. Holmes—both, in differing language, urging strong measures; but the former is for coercion, the latter for the expropriation of the landlords on favourable terms. Mr. Freeman denounces the proceedings of the Austrians in Bosnia with his usual acrimony. Mr. Gundry contributes a somewhat rose-coloured account of the prospects of the North Borneo Company. The other papers include an erudite article on the Cabiri of Samothrace, by Mr. Stuart Glennie; an eloquent appeal from "Vernon Lee" to evolutionists to give up vivisection as hostile to the evolution of morality; and obituary notices of the late Professor Green, by Mr. Nettleship and Professor Bryce.

The contents of the Gentleman's Magazine are varied and entertaining. Mr. Boyle leads off with a Malay tale, exciting but not easily followed, of a native who incurs the vengeance of a Chinese secret society by concealing a diamond. Mr. Wedmore's "rare book" is the editio princeps of Wordsworth's Lyrical Ballads, the history of which is very agreeably told. "In the Kingdom of Kerry" is equal to any other of the Hon. Miss Lawless's charming Irish papers. "Furred and Feathered Foes" contains some extraordinary particulars of the mischief wrought by rabbits and similar pests at the antipodes. "The Cut and its Folk-Lore" is full of the most quaint and curious illustrations of popular superstition.

Belgravia is very lively and entertaining with the continuation of "All Sorts and Conditions of Men;" a capital burlesque account of a revolution in a petty Central American State, and the loan which resulted therefrom; "John Wilkes at Brighton," and a descriptive sketch of Wharfedale by Mrs. Macquoid. Mr. Preece's valuable papers on electric lighting are continued in Time, and there is a full analysis of Rossetti's poetry from the pen of Mr. G. Barnett Smith. A contributor to the Burlington takes a highly encouraging view of the prospects of the Jewish race, and well he may, since he estimates their present number at seven hundred thousand millions! Mrs. Riddell's magazine, which begins a new volume this month, comes out in a new form. Its title of "Home" is changed to that of "St. Bride's," a Magazine for the City and the West-End—the change being doubtless suggested by its place of publication; and its price is now One Shilling. Mrs. Riddell has obtained the aid of some new writers of note, and will herself shortly contribute to it papers on that old London she knows so well.

Messrs. Cassell, Petter, and Galpin are continually bringing out new and (it is almost needless to say) good productions. This month they issue the first part of the Illustrated Book of Canaries and Cage-Birds and the first part of an Illustrated Bible, with coloured plates. The various periodicals issued by this firm include—The Magazine of Art, Picturesque Europe, the Family Magazine, Universal History, Gleanings from Popular Authors, Picturesque America, British Ballads, Old and New London, Old and New Edinburgh, Science for All, Familiar Wild Flowers, and Royal Shakspeare.

Among the Fashion Books are—La Saison, Le Monde Elegant, Le Moniteur de la Mode, World of Fashion, Ladies' Gazette of Fashion, Le Follet, Ladies' Treasury, Myra's Journal, Myra's Mid-Monthly, Weldon's Ladies' Journal and Household Journal, Young Ladies' Journal, and Dictionary of Needlework.

Other magazines and serial publications received are:—Army and Navy Magazine, Sanitary Record, the Squire, Journal of Forestry, St. James's, Churchman, Across Country, Aunt Judy's Magazine, Art and Letters, Men of Mark, Pathways of Palestine, St. Nicholas, Irish Monthly, Universal Instructor, Month, Science Gossip, Argosy, Good Words, Leisure Hour (containing the Autobiography, hitherto unpublished, of William Jackson, of Exeter, the well-known musician), Churchman's Shilling Magazine, Antiquary, Bibliographer; and monthly parts of Chambers's Journal, All the Year Round, Household Words, Harper's Young People, Knowledge, Our Darlings, Sunday at Home, Sunday Magazine, Day of Rest, Boy's Own Paper, and Girl's Own Paper.

THE CHURCH.

PREFEMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.

 Bernard, H. M., Assistant-Curate of St. George's-in-the-East; Assistant-Chaplain at Moscow.
 Richard, John Gallienne; Perpetual Curate of Needham, Norfolk.
 Birkmyre, N.; Vicar of St. Simon's, Baptist Mills, Bristol.
 Burbridge, Edward; Vicar of Backwell.
 Dunn, Oliver J., Curate of St. James's, Wolverhampton; Vicar of All Saints' Wolverhampton.
 Farmer, F. L., Curate of Stockbridge; Vicar of St. James's, Mill Brook, Staleybridge.
 Gray, A. E. A.; Vicar of St. George's, Poynton-with-Worth, near Stockport.
 Niblett, Henry Morton; Rector of Redmarley D'Abitot.
 Raymond, John Storey; Rector of Hemington-cum-Hardington.
 Wingate, George; Vicar of St. Mary, Haggerston.—Guardian.

The Gazette contains the appointment of the Rev. William Boyd Carpenter, M.A., to be Canon of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, in the place of the late Rev. Hugh Pearson.

The Spring Conference of the Church Association was held last week at Willis's Rooms, under the presidency of Mr. Thomas R. Andrews.

The Rochester Diocesan Conference meets at Southwark on the 25th inst., and, among other business, enters on the scheme for building ten churches in South London.

By permission of the Duke of Westminster, an entertainment on behalf of St. Mark's Church, Clerkenwell, was held at Grosvenor House recently. Miss Holland's choir sang.

The Duke of Connaught presided recently at Willis's Rooms at the anniversary festival of the Friends of the Clergy Corporation. The subscription-list amounted to £1800, being the largest for twenty-six years past.

A fancy bazaar was held in the conservatory of the Royal Horticultural Gardens on Wednesday and Thursday, last week, for the purpose of raising funds to build a large parish-room for St. Augustine's Church, South Kensington.

Sir Samuel Wilson, of Hughenden Manor, is about to place, in St. Michael's Church, at Hughenden, a stained glass window in commemoration of her Majesty's escape from the attack made upon her at Windsor by Maclean.

Mr. W. J. Evelyn, J.P., on Saturday last laid the foundation-stone of the Church of St. Barnabas, in Evelyn-street, Deptford. It will be in connection with the South-Eastern District of the Royal Association in Aid of the Deaf and Dumb. The chaplain is to be the Rev. J. W. A. Sturdee.

The company appointed for the revision of the Authorised Version of the Old Testament concluded their seventy-fifth session yesterday week at the Chapter Library, Westminster. The second revision of Ezekiel was finished and the second revision of Daniel was carried as far as the end of chapter ii.

The Bishop of London presided last week at King's College over the annual meeting of St. John's House and Sisterhood. The report showed that the work of the Sisterhood was still increasing, and was doing much to diminish human suffering, especially among the poor.

The Ven. Alfred Blomfield, Archdeacon of Essex, who has been appointed Bishop of Colchester as suffragan to the Bishop of St. Albans, is a son of the late Bishop Blomfield, formerly Bishop of London, and had a distinguished University career as a member of Balliol College, Oxford.

The Rev. A. H. De Fontaine, Rector of Christ Church, Southwark, appeals for contributions to enable him to give a day's holiday, and one good meal, to six hundred poor children, dwelling in one of the most unsavoury localities in the metropolis, the New Cut, and its crowded courts, who have but this one opportunity in the year of breathing pure air and enjoying the refreshing sight of the country.

Lady Marian Alford on Thursday week opened additional school buildings in connection with the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Red Lion-square, Holborn. The additional accommodation provides for 210 children, bringing up the total number of school places to 760. The cost of this undertaking amounted to £1350, nearly the whole of which has been paid. Mr. J. G. Hubbard, M.P., gave an address, dwelling upon the necessity for distinctive religious teaching in schools.

Recently the Townhall, Kensington, was thronged by the patrons of a bazaar originated on behalf of the new church at Hammersmith. Princess Mary Adelaide (Duchess of Teck), the Duchess of Argyll, and many other distinguished personages lent their support. The hall was handsomely decorated. In the gallery were staged several hundred orchids, kindly lent by Mr. J. T. Peacock, Sudbury House, Hammersmith, from his unrivalled collection.

The forty-seventh anniversary meeting of the Church Pastoral Aid Society was held recently in St. James's Hall, Piccadilly, and was fairly well attended. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided. The report showed that the income of the past year has been £55,659, an increase upon that of the preceding year of £7110. In addition to this sum, £35,121 had been received locally and from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and disbursed in supplementing the grants of this society, and £2000 had been given for a special purpose. The expenditure had been £46,542.

A stained-glass window has been presented to the Church of St. Margaret, Westminster, by American citizens, as a memorial to Sir Walter Raleigh, whose headless body lies interred near the communion-table. Underneath the window are the following lines, written by Mr. J. R. Lowell, the American Minister:—

The New World's sons, from England's breast we drew
 Such milk as bids remember whence we came;
 Proud of her Past, wherefrom our Present grew,
 This window we inscribe with Raleigh's name.

The stained glass fills the large west window of the church, and was unveiled on Sunday at the morning service, when a sermon was preached by the Rev. Canon Farrar, D.D.

The annual conference of clergy and churchwardens connected with the Bishop of London's Fund was held at Zion College, London Wall, on Monday; the Bishop of London in the chair. The chairman stated that the income had still been insufficient to meet their requirements, and that they had not reached the sum of £20,000, which would enable them to carry on properly the work they had in hand. He had consecrated six new churches during the year, making in all 103 churches he had consecrated since he had been in the diocese. The fund had made seventeen grants for new mission buildings, and forty-three grants for carrying on mission homes. The future was an anxious one for them, as during the last ten years the population in the diocese of London had increased by 379,000, or 38,000 each year; and what made the problem more difficult was that the increase had taken place in entirely new ground—the suburbs. The Bishop of Bedford stated that it was very disappointing to such a fund to show signs of falling off, as the need of it was as great as ever. Other speakers followed.

BENEVOLENCE AND SELF-HELP.

The National Society has voted £500 towards the proposed training college for mistresses in East London.

The Prince of Wales has consented to preside at a dinner to be held at Willis's Rooms on June 14 in aid of the funds of the London Fever Hospital.

A large number of cases of saving life from drowning have been investigated by the committee of the Royal Humane Society, which has conferred its rewards on many recipients.

Last week the Lord Mayor presided at the anniversary festival of the Metropolitan Free Hospital, at the Albion Tavern. The subscriptions amounted to nearly £2000.

A concert at St. James's Hall will be given this (Saturday) evening in aid of the Printers' Pension Corporation. Numerous artists of note contribute their valuable services.

The 124th annual dinner of the Orphan Working Schools took place recently at Willis's Rooms; Mr. Colman, M.P., in the chair. The subscriptions amounted to £4000.

Mr. Brandram will give a recitation of Sheridan's "Rivals" next Thursday, at Grosvenor House, in aid of the funds of the London Fever Hospital.

The Cooks' Company and the Curriers' Company have made grants of ten guineas each to the Royal Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, City-road.

Professor Huxley presided last Saturday evening at the sixty-seventh annual dinner of the Artists' Benevolent Institution, which took place at Willis's Rooms. The subscriptions amounted to £3342.

Lord Brabourne, supported by a distinguished company, presided at Willis's Rooms at the festival of the News-vendors' Benevolent and Provident Institution last week, and subscriptions to the amount of £550 were announced.

The final meeting of the members of the committee of the Mechi Fund has been held, under the presidency of Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P. The money, amounting to nearly £5000, has been invested for the benefit of Mrs. Mechi and family.

Mr. Henry Edwards, the Liberal member for Weymouth, has announced his intention to invest £5000 for the aged poor of the town. Mr. Edwards makes one stipulation—that out of the interest on the money his annual dinner to the aged poor shall be continued.

Princess Louise opened at South Hampstead on Saturday last the twenty-fourth school established by the Girls' Public School Company in connection with the National Union for Improving the Education of Women, of which her Royal Highness is president.

The Duke of Connaught having been prevented by sudden illness from presiding at the anniversary festival of the Infant Orphan Asylum, Wanstead, last year, has promised to take the chair this year; and has appointed Saturday, June 24, for the purpose. The festival will be held at Wanstead.

The Princess of Wales has announced her intention of being present at the concert to be given to-day (Saturday) at the Albert Hall, by the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society, and the Duchess of Edinburgh has signified her intention to patronise it. This concert is in aid of the funds of the West-End Hospital for Diseases of the Nervous System, Welbeck-street.

The 228th anniversary of the Sons of the Clergy Corporation was celebrated on the 10th inst. by a full choral and orchestral service in St. Paul's Cathedral, and a dinner at the Merchant Taylors' Hall, at which the Lord Mayor presided; the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, and other prelates being present. Subscriptions and donations to the amount of £3081 were collected in the course of the day.

The thirtieth annual meeting of the governors of the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond-street, was held on the 10th inst. in the board-room at the hospital—Lord Aberdare in the chair. The report stated that the number of in-patients admitted during the year was 1050, and the out-patients receiving advice and medicine amounted to 13,180. The income amounted to £9973, the expenditure being £10,202.

The annual meeting of the Society for the Employment of Women was held yesterday week at their offices in Berners-street, Oxford-street, and was well attended, principally by ladies. The Earl of Shaftesbury occupied the chair. The secretary read the twenty-third annual report, which spoke of the various industries in which, through the instrumentality of the society, women are employed.

The Duke of Cambridge presided on the 10th inst. at the annual dinner of the German Hospital, Dalston, held in Willis's Rooms, where there was a large company. The receipts for the past year were £9297, and the expenditure was £8628. During the course of the evening the secretary announced donations and subscriptions amounting to £4372; including £20 from the chairman, £200 from the Emperor of Germany, and £50 from the Emperor of Austria.

Miss Rye's next party of children for Canada will leave England in July or August, and she will be glad to hear through Bible women, City missionaries, district visitors, or others interested in the poor, of any destitute little girls between the ages of nine and fourteen, whose friends are willing for them to emigrate. Applications must be made at once to Miss Lizzie Still, secretary, Avenue House, High-street, Peckham, London.

The Duke of Connaught presided at the ninety-fourth anniversary festival of the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls, which was held on the 10th inst. at the Freemasons' Tavern. In proposing "The Health of the Queen," the chairman announced that her Majesty had authorised him to state that she would accept the position of chief patroness of the Masonic Institution for Girls. The subscriptions amounted to £13,232, consisting of £5624 from London and £7608 from the provinces.

In consequence of the tragedy in Dublin, the theatrical entertainment to be given on the 17th inst. at the Savoy Theatre by the "Irish Amateurs," in aid of the "Distressed Irish Ladies' Fund," has been postponed to Wednesday, June 14.—A bazaar has been arranged in aid of the fund for ladies in distress, from non-payment of rent in Ireland, to take place on June 15 and 16, in the conservatory at the Horticultural Gardens. The Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal Family intend to honour this bazaar with their patronage.

Lord Carrington, chairman of the executive council of the Royal Agricultural Benevolent Institution, calls attention to the claims of the institution at the present time. He states that since the foundation of the society 900 cases of real agricultural distress have been permanently relieved, at a cost exceeding £95,000; and 550 necessitous farmers, their widows, and orphans now swell the list of pensioners, at an annual cost of £12,000. At the ensuing election in June, sixty-five additional pensioners will be enrolled; but, at the same time, nearly 400 unsuccessful candidates will remain on the list by reason of the insufficiency of funds. To meet these demands on their resources, and to enable the executive to provide for the whole of the applicants brought to penury by the unprecedented depression of the times, a further sum of £8000 or £9000 a year is required.

ST. GOTHARD TUNNEL: SWISS ENTRANCE TO THE TUNNEL NEAR GOESCHENEN.

ST. GOTHARD TUNNEL: ITALIAN APPROACH TO THE TUNNEL NEAR AIROLO.
The signage are the old carriage road.

ST. GOTHARD TUNNEL: COMPRESSED-AIR ENGINES, USED IN BORING THE TUNNEL.

THE ST. GOTHARD TUNNEL.

We present two or three additional illustrations of this great engineering work, the completion of which is now about to be celebrated, though much remains to be done before the whole line of railway can be worked for ordinary traffic. The tunnel itself, and the means which have been employed for its construction, were described in former notices of the subject. One of our engravings represents the compressed-air locomotive engine, which has been made serviceable for carrying out the earth and stones from the tunnel during the work of excavation, but which is not of the kind adapted for drawing passenger-trains. It is, we believe, still under consideration whether the railway traffic in the tunnel shall be served by compressed-air locomotives, or by those impelled by electricity, or by stationary engines; but steam locomotives are found quite unsuitable, and we believe that this will be the result in most tunnels of great length with no intermediate shafts for ventilation. We present also Views of the Swiss end of the tunnel, near the village of Goeschenen, in the upper valley of the Reuss; and the southern approach, from the Italian side, in the neighbourhood of Airolo, situated on a tributary of the Ticino, in the Val Tremola, where the zigzag lines of the old carriage road form a peculiar feature of the scene.

GRAND HISTORIC COMMEMORATION AT BERNE.

On Monday week the city of Berne, in Switzerland, was enlivened by a grand national festival—Berne has a very ancient national history, antecedent to the Swiss Confederation—with a procession designed to illustrate not only the historic, but the romantic and pre-historic, incidents of its olden time. The zeal of patriotic antiquarianism went back to the aboriginal dwellers in huts built on piles, a thousand years before the Christian era, and through the successive periods of stone implements, of bronze, and of iron, to that of the Helvetic tribes who contended with the Roman legions; and there were figures in strange costumes, meant to represent those wild warriors, herdsmen, and horsemen, of primitive ages, including that of "Diviko," followed by a triumphal bullock-waggon, and a party of captive Romans, with their hands tied behind their backs. Then came, on horseback, in modern Swiss militia uniforms, the members of the Berne Commemoration Committee, with their Marshals and Adjutants; but in the next division of the procession, which was intended to illustrate the mediæval history of Berne, there was much proof of learned research and of artistic taste. Berchtold von Zahringen and Kuno von Bubenberg, feudal Dukes or Lords of the twelfth century, who founded or protected this city on the banks of the Aar, rode past in all the pomp of chivalry, but in peaceful guise and mood, with their ladies, attendant knights, pages, huntsmen and hounds, and armed peasantry of their train. The founding of Berne, in A.D. 1191, was of course made very conspicuous, with figures of the Duke of Zahringen and some Archbishop or Bishop, carried along upon a moving platform, superintending the architects and masons who began to build the walls of the city. Battles for its early liberties, the fight of the Schlosshalde, in 1283, that of Donnerbühl, in 1298, and that of Laupen, in 1339, with the men of most renowned valour upon those occasions, notably Rudolf von Erlach, filled up a considerable space. Then came, from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century, the progress of arts, industry, and commerce, examples of which were shown by the different trade-guilds, with their banners and symbolical devices, and the implements of their craft. The Bears (Bären), which have always been held in peculiar honour by the citizens of Berne, as guardian beasts of the civic community, were followed by a queer collection of other animals, the lions walking erect arm-in-arm, the stag or hart, the bull, the ape, the eagle, and the dragon, which were supposed to represent various local interests. The foundation, in 1421, of the fine Gothic Cathedral, known to most English tourists, was one of the subjects commemorated in the procession, which also included many notable events and personages of the Swiss War of Independence, the Protestant Reformation, the Peasant War of the seventeenth century, the French Revolutionary War and those of Napoleon I. The civil institutions, and social customs, manners, and diversions of the Bernese population, in town and country, were brought fully before the spectators. This long pageant ended with a set of figures meant to give some idea of the Future, or "Berne as it will be;" in which the possibilities of scientific improvement, in the twentieth century, were boldly displayed to view; the steam-engine, the electric telegraph, and the telephone were seen in wonderful action. There was a flying-machine, worked by steam, which seemed just about to rise into the air; but the steam soldier, wearing a boiler for his helmet, with a huge pair of iron shields, like a bird's wings, readily shifted to protect any part of his body, would be more than a match for Achilles. The proceeds of the entertainment were bestowed on local charities. Our Illustrations are copied from the cleverly-drawn "Album" of this procession, by Karl Jauslin, sold by R. F. Haller, at Berne.

AMERICAN "SYSTEM."

"We do things differently in the States." Such are the words constantly upon the lips of our American cousins: nor are they always spoken boastfully either, but simply according to their meaning. Theatres, warehouses, offices, public and private, all have a system of management which differs in many material points from ours—and, I am bound to say, suffers nothing by comparison. In no two things is this difference so plainly apparent as in the systems which prevail in the two countries respecting the arrangements for travelling, and the care and management of horses. A great deal has been already said upon the former subject; but it is not yet worn threadbare, and a good deal more might be said with advantage; for are we not all disagreeably familiar with the slipshod method which prevails—in poor Ireland, at all events—with regard, for example, to travellers' luggage—in glaring contrast to the regularity and comfort which characterise American management? In one country we have the hurry-scurry when the train arrives, passengers crowding promiscuously around the luggage-van, confusing and impeding the officials, clamouring each above the other in their efforts to be first attended to, and often seizing upon trunks and portmanteaus which are not their own—accidentally, no doubt, in some cases, but not in all; nor can there be any doubt that the present system of railway travelling throughout the United Kingdom affords opportunities for crime—murder and robbery—which do not exist in other quarters of the globe. On the arrival of a train at any station throughout England, Scotland, or Ireland, all that is necessary for a dishonest man or woman to do in order to obtain possession of another person's property is to secure the services of a porter, give him a substantial fee in advance, hurry with him to the luggage-van, point out any trunk, box, or valise which may appear desirable, say quietly, "That is mine," and the porter immediately shoulders it and conveys it away to the nearest cab. The rightful owner may, in some isolated instances, turn up at the moment and interfere in time to prevent the successful appropriation of the property in question. It is then easy to say a mistake has been committed; but, in nine cases out of ten, goods can be, and are, purloined without suspicion or detection. Twice within one comparatively short journey have I rescued my luggage from marauding hands; nor do I think I have ever travelled on any line of railway throughout the kingdom without the possibility presenting itself of my being able to appropriate almost any article from the baggage-van which I might choose to claim.

This carelessness, or mismanagement, is certainly in strong contrast to the system which prevails in America, where, on the arrival of a train, a baggage-man in uniform presents himself to each passenger in turn—gets possession of the number or ticket which has been given him as a voucher—asks him whither he is bound, and then the traveller has no further trouble or responsibility, for, on reaching his hotel or lodging, his luggage is either awaiting him or arrives at the same moment as himself.

In glaring contrast, also, is the regularity which marks the traffic management of America, in comparison with our less go-ahead country here. Throughout the States there is not one moment's unnecessary delay in dispatching trains. Everything is done strictly up to time, whilst here we are so inured to irregularity that we accustom ourselves to expect it, and, in short, look for nothing else. The late Lord Carlisle, who was Viceroy of Ireland for a good many years, was wont to relate how upon one occasion, when travelling from Dublin to "ye citie of ye tribes" (Galway), he was so impatient of the long delay at every little petty station that at length, during a very protracted and apparently unnecessary stoppage, he put out his head and inquired of the guard when they intended to go on. The answer was characteristic of the Celtic race—"When we're ready!"

The entire system of railway management in our country is lamentably at fault. Putting aside the more important features of murder and robbery, there are many other preventable evils with which we have not so much as attempted to cope. It is no uncommon thing, throughout Ireland at all events, for trains to be detained outside stations from twenty minutes to an hour on fair or hunting days, owing to the fact that the train which has arrived a little in advance cannot get out of the way until it has disgorged its load of horses, as well as of passengers; and this is made difficult of accomplishment by the fractiousness of the animals, which are frightened of the bar that extends across the upper part of the doorway of their boxes, and so refuse to come out; whilst owners and porters drag ruthlessly at their heads, increasing instead of diminishing their alarm, and the train which is waiting to get in keeps signalling and whistling shrilly, in wonder and impatience at the delay; whilst perishing passengers—thrusting their heads from the windows—think diamally of equally perishing friends awaiting them upon the platform, and of dinners or suppers, as the case may be, growing cold or sodden; whilst other peoples' horses are pulled, and pushed, and beaten, and dragged, and coaxed, and abused by turps, to induce them to quit the boxes in which they have travelled. It seems perfectedly marvellous how such atrocious mismanagement can be permitted to prevail, when by the simplest contrivance in the world—a hinged bar, such as is common throughout the States, made to bend upward at a light touch from the hand—all trouble and delay could easily be avoided. Hunting days are extremely rare in America, for it is not a hunting country; but the transit of horses is continuous, and to watch one of these cattle-laden trains draw up and disburden itself, without noise, confusion, or delay, and then cross the water and see how very differently things are managed here, fills us with wonder to think that the other country should have so great an advantage.

It is astonishing, too, that we should so long go on in the jog-trot uncomfortable fashion of cramming a certain number of persons into busses and tram-cars, merely stating that the vehicles are constructed to hold so many on each side, without any regard to the fact that some selfish persons occupy much more than their fair share of space, leaving others to be unduly crushed and inconvenienced. In some parts of America all this is obviated by dividing or apportioning the seats with little metal arms, thus giving to each passenger his fair share of room, enabling him to see at once on entering the vehicle where he is to sit, and to occupy his seat as though he had a right to it, instead of, as here, doing so on a kind of sufferance, glared at by some corpulent old gentleman upon one side, and some irritable old lady upon the other, neither of whom has been the least bit willing to make space for him to sit down. The apportioning of the seats is also most beneficial in enabling the conductor to perceive at once, when hailed by a foot-passenger, whether or not he has a vacant seat in his vehicle, and obviates the necessity for his delaying to count how many passengers he has already accommodated. The unoccupied place, protected from intrusion by its little arms, shows clearly out from amongst the mass of garments, and proclaims itself ready for its occupant.

It is, to me, amazing how little is known amongst us of things which in America are in daily use. How common it is here to see men driving their horses with boots; in other words, bandages around the fetlocks. This is to prevent cutting, or "brushing," a very general fault amongst English horses, but unknown in the States, owing to the system upon which colts are trained. Toe-weights are used during the young ones' early lessons, for the purpose of forming a habit or peculiar style. These toe-weights, unknown to us, are very extensively used for trotters. They are of iron or lead, from four ounces up to any required weight, and are secured or "buckled" on the foot. When used on the out-sides of the hind feet they cause the horse to "spread," or, in other words, prevent his fetlocks from approaching too high one another—compelling him, also, to pass his hind feet well outside the front ones in trotting fast. It is a much esteemed quality in a horse to spread behind; and some horses, whose training has been carried to excess, are almost caricatures in this respect: notably, an animal called Thorndale, a celebrated sire of trotters. Toe-weights proper are on the front part of the fore feet. Here they impart knee action and lengthen the stride, enabling a horse to get his front feet well out of the way of the hind ones if he does not spread enough. The various ways of using the toe and side weights are endless, and by their judicious use many animals are sold for high prices which might otherwise be almost valueless. The idea is much the same as weighting the shoe; with this advantage, however, a toe-weight may be removed at pleasure, when a shoe may not. No doubt they have much to recommend them; but a line must be sharply drawn between use and abuse, for the excessive adoption of them has knocked up many a horse's legs.

By the proper use of toe-weights a pacer may be converted into a trotter. Pacers are frequently the swiftest of trotters when once trained to their work, and are worth four times as much money as before. These weights may also be made useful in preventing horses from "breaking" when training for trots, provided the trainer keep him to a jog whilst he has them on. There is in my opinion, however, another and a better method of preventing the tendency to break. When the horse is young he should be jogged to a common road-cart until he has become accustomed to the restraint of the harness and the weight of the cart; he may then occasionally be sent at the top of his speed, or even beyond it, to teach him to catch from a break. It is a good plan, during this course of training, to harness him now and then to the gig or sulky, in order to accustom him to its use, as many young animals prove at first extremely awkward when attached to such a vehicle.

In Kentucky there are yearlings which can trot their mile in three and a half minutes. This to us appears simply marvellous, but trainers from that part of the country have informed me that they force on the youngsters to perform such feats, in order, as they express it, to "show speed for the money," which, as a rule, is very soon forthcoming for a budding trotter.

These yearlings are broken, fed, and trained with wonderful skill. They soon learn to trot "to harness," which means in a queer two-wheeled thing called a sulky, which weighs about sixty pounds—sometimes less—and is capable of carrying one man only. Trotting "to waggon" means in a four-wheeled sulky, which is a heavy trial for a youngster. These yearlings usually do well, and are healthy; but very many are sacrificed to early development. To buy one of them is called "purchasing prospects," and frequently nothing else is obtained.

The trotting turf is not considered in America so refined, or, as they say, "genteel," as racing proper; but is more generally popular, as any man may use his trotter in the commonest trade-cart if he likes, and with a very small amount of handling bring him to the post with undiminished speed. These wonderful trotters are not by any means a particular craze of mine. Were I an inhabitant of the Kentucky region I should not join the "fashion" in keeping them at all; at the same time, seeing how highly they are esteemed, I would never have a brood mare or sire which was not full of approved trotting blood, of which the very bluest is the Hambletonian strain.

It is a queer idea of mine, but I think upheld by facts, that the higher a man rises socially in the States the less he uses his trotters, except for ordinary road purposes. A new man, self-made and rich, must have them on the track, he will not otherwise be satisfied; but twenty to one, his son—more polished and "genteel" than himself—will have his trotter in his stable, for private use only. Very few of the younger men in America go in for trotting, but almost all patronise racing.

Immense prices are paid for fast trotters intended for private use. Any fine afternoon, on certain roads about New York, you may see men in light sulkys, driving horses which have cost them from £600 to £4000 each, and can do their mile and repeat (and more if required) in less than two and half minutes. They trot with one another on these roads, which are specially reserved for a high rate of speed—as the Row is here for equestrians. Many rich men have three or more of these horses, according to their means. Some millionaires keep quite a stud, as an Englishman does of hunters. Such animals can do an incredible number of miles in the day, partly at racing speed, and must—in order to accomplish such heavy work—be hard-bottomed, fine-bred animals, almost incapable of fatigue. I may add that they are most esteemed when not requiring toe-weights.

It is astonishing how game and forward are young horses bred in Kentucky and about East Greenwich, which is a famous rearing place. I was shown a young filly, only six weeks old—dam by Leamington, the sire of Iroquois and Parole—who had chanced to stray away, and in order to get back to her dam had jumped a 2½-foot bar; the extent of the jump, from taking-off to landing, being something over twenty feet. Our Irish horses are esteemed wonderful jumpers, and justly so; they will clear almost any height, but I have never seen a youngster in our country who was capable of compassing such a stretch. NANNIE POWER O'DONOGHUE.

NOVELS.

Broad, liberal, kindly views, and a sympathetic largeness of heart are conspicuous throughout the pages of A Broken Lily: by Mrs. Mortimer Collins (Hurst and Blackett), and a remarkably vivacious style of writing is well sustained throughout the three volumes. An extremely pretty idea, moreover, forms the basis of the story and is indicated in the title. The appreciation of natural scenery is keen and vividly expressed; there is some excellent portraiture, and good sport is afforded by certain sketches abounding with proof of the writer's intimate acquaintance with the little weaknesses and especially with the sly and spiteful ways of womankind. The first volume is unusually fresh and charming, raising expectations of a novel very far indeed above the average in originality of conception, neatness of execution, intensity of feeling, and general interest. That expectation, however, to tell the plain truth, is by no means realised, notwithstanding the somewhat startling boldness both of the situations presented and of the language employed, to say nothing of the sentiments enunciated by one or more of the personages. Indeed, it is possible that certain readers may be shocked by what will appear to them to savour of profanity and by what, from their point of view, may seem to be unnecessary bluntness in dealing with delicate matters. It is always a perilous thing for a writer to handle such a subject as the love, which has ceased to be paternal, of a supposed stepfather for a supposed step-daughter, and, though it may all come right in the end, most readers feel a sense of uneasiness and displeasure in reading of such matters. In the present instance, however, the danger is all the less, because the reader is likely to guess rather sooner than is usual which way the cat will jump. The story, put briefly, just tells how a gentleman of means and position is induced to marry a designing woman whose reputed little daughter, having inspired him first of all with a fatherly affection, is adopted by him, grows up in the likeness of "the broken lily," he had most romantically and poetically loved, and ends by inspiring him with a very unfatherly passion, and how he escapes from his disagreeable predicament. There is but little substance in the tale, and that little is expanded, by means of common-place incidents, somewhat revolting, described at inordinate length, until the material will hold out no longer. The first volume is delightful, and if the second and third had been compressed into one as good as the first, or if each of them had been filled after the fashion of the first, the whole might have been described as a really admirable piece of work.

Improvement of mind and morals may very well follow upon a careful and appreciative perusal of Scotch Marriages: by Sarah Tytler (Smith, Elder, and Co.), which is a collection of short stories bound up together in three volumes under a single comprehensive title. Nothing could be more wholesome than the tone adopted by the writer, nothing more instructive than the lessons inculcated, nothing more human and humane than the sentiments intended for acceptance, nothing more life-like than the descriptions, nothing more simple, and at the same time attractive and appropriate, than the style. Let the readers, however, prepare to be contented with what is of a homely and domestic kind, though the very best of that kind, for there is very little indeed of ingenious plot, or exciting incidents, or grand conception, or intense passion, or whatever else is considered by some writers of utopies to be absolutely necessary if the reader is to be captivated. There is plenty of fun, however, of the quiet sort, which is far more calculated than the boisterous to last and keep a reader in constant good humour without the slightest strain. Of course all the scenes are coloured Scotch, and the Scotch dialect prevails in the dialogue, but the effect is by no means disagreeable; nay, there is a positive gain of novelty and piquancy. There is an exceedingly well-told story of a Scotch Judge, a man of great physical, mental, and moral power, with the courage of a lion everywhere but in the midst of his own family of grown-up children, to whom he defers with a touching humility proceeding rather from true nobleness of nature than from vulgar timidity. This almost great man, under the influence partly of love, partly of compassion, partly of chivalry, partly of a longing for a personal protectress against the tyranny of his own flesh and blood, actually elopes in his old age with a very fascinating widow, and, regardless of his position and his years, contracts a romantic "Scotch marriage," as if he were a dashing young Lochinvar running off with a giddy young bride. Why he should take the trouble to elope, when both he and the widow have a perfect right to do as they please, is, of course, to be explained by the grinding tyranny to which he is subjected at home. Unfortunately, the comfortable perusal of this story, and of another, which, though not so droll, is even more admirable, is sadly interfered with by some accidental intermixture of leaves, and it is some time before the reader can discover what is the matter. It turns out eventually that neither reader nor author is mad, but that somebody, whether under alcoholic or other inspiration, has treated parts of the first and second volumes as if they were fairly interchangeable; and the interchanges, moreover, are many and inconsecutive, which makes the matter worse. However, it is probable that reviewers only, and not the public, will be supplied with such fearfully and wonderfully compounded copies, of which it is to be hoped that there is no very large quantity on hand; else many a willing reader may be unjustly irritated against the author, and desist in despair from what ought to be a most gratifying and entertaining course of literature.

The Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to consider the bill proposing to establish a fish and vegetable market in South London, near the Elephant and Castle Station, have decided that the preamble of the bill has been proved, subject to the approaches to the market being made. They propose to secure the public by inserting provisions in the bill embodying Mr. Plimsoll's offer—namely, that he will give a subvention of £2000 towards the widening of Rockingham-street if that be done by the vestry within ten years, which will give the vestry an opportunity of deferring the alteration until the present tenants' leases fall in.

SOLICITORS.
Charles Norris Wilde, Esq.
Ernest James Wilde, Esq.

RICHARD BLANEY WADE, Esq., in the Chair.

The Directors have pleasure in submitting to the Shareholders the following Statement of Accounts for the year 1881, viz.:

Balance of Undivided Profits from Dec. 31, 1880 .. £37,31 3 0
Net Profits for the year 1881, after making provision for Bad and Doubtful Debts, Rebate on Bills Discounted, &c. .. 407,888 3 2
£445,199 6 2

Less Dividend of 4 per cent, paid in July, 1881 .. £79,200 0 0
Less Dividend of 4 per cent, paid in January, 1882 .. 81,450 0 0
Less Bonus of 5 per cent, paid in January, 1882 .. 90,000 0 0
Less Bonus of 7 per cent, payable in July .. 142,537 10 0
£402,187 10 0

The profits of the past year enable the Directors to recommend that a Bonus of 7 per cent, for the half-year ending Dec. 31 last, be now declared, payable in July next; this, with the Dividends and Bonus, already paid, makes the total distribution 20 per cent for the year 1881, free of income tax. The balance of £30,351 16s. 2d. carried forward to the year 1882, with the Reserve Fund of £1,278,750, makes the Rest or Undivided Profits at Dec. 31, 1881, £1,318,101 16s. 2d.

The Reserve Fund, £1,278,750, wholly invested in Government Securities, shows an increase of £145,716 during the year 1881, as stated hereunder, viz.:

Amount at Dec. 31, 1880 .. £1,133,034 0 0
Premiums on New Shares since received .. 145,716 0 0
£1,278,750 0 0

The average of the published rates of the Bank of England for the year 1881 was 4½ per cent, as compared with 4½ per cent for the year 1880.

The Directors report with deep regret the death of Mr. Edward Atkinson, who for a great number of years rendered most important and valuable services to the Bank in the varied capacities of Inspector, General Manager, and Honorary Director.

The Directors, in anticipation of the early retirement of Mr. Fergusson, after thirty-seven years' service in the Bank, considering the importance of having a successor ready to fill the vacancy who will then take place, have appointed Mr. Churchward, who has been for many years manager of the Bute Docks Branch at Cardiff, to be a Joint General Manager.

The following Directors go out of office by rotation, but, being eligible for re-election, offer themselves accordingly, viz.:

The Most Hon. the Marquis of Ailesbury.
Henry Paull, Esq.
Richard Blaney Wade, Esq.

In conformity with the provisions of the Act, it will be requisite for the Shareholders to elect Auditors and vote their remuneration. Mr. Edwin Waterhouse, of the firm of Messrs. Price, Waterhouse, and Co., and Mr. Frederick Mackay, of the firm of Messrs. B. Mackay and Co., offer themselves for re-election.

Joint General Managers.

We beg to report that we have ascertained the correctness of the cash balances, and of the money at call and short notice as entered in the above Balance Sheet, and have inspected the securities representing the investments of the Bank, and found them in order. We have also examined the Balance Sheet in detail with the books at the Head Office and with the certified returns from each Branch, and in our opinion such Balance Sheet is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Bank's affairs as shown by such books and returns.

EDWIN WATERHOUSE, Esq.,
ROD. MACKAY, Esq.,
Auditors.

The above Report having been read, it was unanimously resolved:—
That the same be adopted and printed for the use of the Proprietors.

That the Most Honourable the Marquis of Ailesbury, Richard Blaney Wade, Esq., and Henry Paull, Esq., be re-elected Directors of the Bank.

That Mr. Edwin Waterhouse and Mr. Frederick Mackay be re-appointed Auditors of the Bank, and that they be paid four hundred guineas for their services during the past year.

That the best thanks of the Proprietors be presented to the Directors for their very successful management of the affairs of the Bank.

That the best thanks of the Proprietors be given to the General Managers and to the Branch Managers and other officers of the Bank for their efficient services.

That the best thanks of the Meeting be presented to the Chairman for his able conduct in the Chair.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"I have attentively examined the beautiful pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons that are exhibited at the Paris International Exhibition of 1878. I consider them to be exceptional in the case with which gradations of sound can be produced, from the softest to the most powerful tones. These excellent pianos merit the approbation of all artists, as the tone is full as well as sustained, and the touch is of perfect evenness throughout its entire range, answering to very requirement of the pianist."

"CH. GOUNOD."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"We, the undersigned, certify that, after having seen and most conscientiously examined the English Pianos at the Universal Exhibition of 1878, we find that the piano belongs to the Grand Piano of the house of Brinsmead."

"NICOLAS RUBINSTEIN,
"D. MAGNUS,
Chevalier ANTOINE DE KONSKI, Court Pianist to the Emperor of Germany."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"I have pleasure in expressing my opinion that the Paris Exhibition Model Grand Pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons are unsurpassed. The tone is deliciously sweet, sustained, and extraordinarily powerful; the touch responds to the faintest and to the most trying strains on it, and the workmanship is simply perfect."

"Illustrated London News."
"The principle of the Brinsmead firm is to give the best piano of its kind the best of materials, the best of care, the best of taste, and the best of finish, and this is why the manufacture in Kentish Town sends down to Wigmore-street so many pianos perfect in scale, sustained in tone, elastic in touch, with equal and responsive touch, and, in fact, as near as possible to that ideal that all musicians must require. A thing of beauty that is a joy for ever."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily Chronicle."
"In tone the instrument is exceedingly rich and sweet, and in touch the very perfection of lightness. Messrs. Brinsmead may certainly be congratulated upon their success."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Morning Advertiser."
"The Legion of Honour. In addition to the other distinctions awarded to Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, the founder of the firm has been created Chevalier of the Legion of Honour."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' PATENT SOSTENENTE PIANOS.

"Daily News."
"A new Pianoforte, recently manufactured by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, claims notice, not only on account of its beauty and richness of tone, but especially for some ingenious mechanical novelties, the most important being the addition of a third pedal, by means of which the sound of any up-bow notes may be almost indefinitely prolonged at the will of the player. Thus bass notes may be sustained after being struck by the left hand, which may then be taken away, and, with the right hand, may execute the most brilliant staccato passages, thus giving almost the effect of four hands. The patent 'check-repeater' action, a specialty of Messrs. Brinsmead, enables the performer to command with ease the most rapid reiteration of the same note; the facility of the key movement in general; being such that glissando passages can be executed with such perfect ease as to render them practicable with the lightest touch. The volume of tone is intensified by a peculiar construction of the sounding-board, another improvement being the system of bridging, by which the vibrations are increased and rendered sympathetic. The Pianoforte is capable of all degrees of delicacy and power, its massive structure rendering it less liable to get out of tune than usual; and the instrument is altogether calculated to extend the reputation of its makers."

FUNERAL OF LORD F. CAVENDISH AT CHATSWORTH.

The martyr, we will say martyred, English victim of Fenian malignity, Lord Frederick Cavendish, slain by assassins in Dublin on Saturday, the 6th inst., the day of his arrival there as Chief Secretary for Ireland, was buried in the family graveyard at Edensor, adjacent to Chatsworth Park, Derbyshire, on Thursday of last week. The funeral was, though prepared with very little pomp, and in a rural situation far from the metropolis and great cities of England, converted by the spontaneous movement of social feeling into a most imposing national demonstration of public sorrow and esteem for the deceased. More than fifty thousand people attended these obsequies, coming from different parts of the country, while from London came her Majesty's Ministers, many of the nobility, and nearly half the members of the House of Commons. It could only be compared to the funeral of Lord Beaconsfield, at Hughenden, as a general exhibition of mournful respect upon such an occasion, but the sentiment of personal regard this time expressed was mixed with profound sympathy for afflicted relatives, with horror and indignation at the atrocious crime, and with almost desponding anxiety concerning the state and prospects of an important part of the kingdom.

Edensor is an ornamental model village, within a mile of the magnificent rural palace of the Duke of Devonshire, and is chiefly inhabited by persons employed on his estate. The houses, mostly erected by the late Duke, are cottages in size, but designed in a variety of architectural styles, the Old English, the Gothic, the Norman, the Swiss, the Italian, and others, each with a pretty and well-kept garden, all beautifully finished. The church is an elegant structure, of Sir Gilbert Scott's design, built some twelve years ago to replace one of older date, and containing a fine altar-tomb or monument, sculptured with several lifesize figures. It is surrounded by a piece of greensward in which there are several graves: one is that of the late Duke; another is that of Sir Joseph Paxton. Here it was, in a simple grave apart, not in a family vault, that the mortal remains of Lord Frederick Cavendish, second son of the present Duke, were to be laid. Before the funeral, his body lay in state, when it had been brought from Dublin, in the private chapel in Chatsworth House. This private chapel is like a drawing-room, except that all along each side of the aisle are placed oak seats for the household of the Duke; and the altar is composed of beautifully-carved alabaster, hewn on the estate. The coffins were three in number, the innermost being of cedar, and inclosed in lead, which is covered outwardly by oak, covered with black velvet. The lid of the coffin was not placed in position, and the features of Lord Frederick were seen to advantage in the dim religious light that played upon his uncovered face from the stained-glass windows. The face was placid in the extreme, and with a look of repose grateful to look upon. The body and the lower part of the coffin was covered by a white silk pall, which fell in graceful folds to the ground, hiding the trestles which sustained the coffin. No catafalque had been raised, no drapery hung, or anything to denote a death chamber. The body lay in the centre of the chapel, and was under the guardianship of the old housekeeper who nursed Lord Frederick as a child.

On the day of the funeral, Thursday, Chatsworth Park early presented a scene both of activity and solemnity. So early as five o'clock small knots of the tenantry crossed the Edensor Bridge, or came through the Park from Baslow, to take the last opportunity of viewing the remains. Soon after eight o'clock the last group of tenants and servants of the household left the chapel, and the members of the bereaved family crossed the white marble floor, and once more gathered for a few minutes round the coffin, which was then closed, and the final preparations for the funeral were made. A special service, attended by members of the family and the servants, was held in the private chapel.

Meantime, in the village of Edensor, and on the roads leading to it and at the nearest railway stations on every side from Chesterfield, from Derby, from Matlock, from Sheffield, from Rowsley, Bakewell, and Buxton, there was an immense concourse of visitors, many coming from Nottingham, from Manchester, and from the West Riding of Yorkshire. At Chatsworth, none but invited and privileged persons could get admission within the park lodges, and at the bridge opposite the house a solitary policeman was sufficient to turn back any stragglers who wished to cross the river. Upon a grassy bottom near the site where Edensor stood before the rebuilding in its present situation, four notice boards were staked, signifying to deputations, tenantry, clergy and magistrates, and the West Riding constituency, the spots at which they were expected to assemble. It was evident, however, that this arrangement was not generally known to the persons concerned, though Mr. Martin, the resident agent, and the gentlemen of his staff, endeavoured to carry it into effect. The tenantry were the largest body here, and there were many more of their class keeping guard around the churchyard, or fulfilling other voluntary duties. In addition to the Chatsworth tenants, there were deputations from the estates at Bolton Abbey, Hardwick, Lismore, and Holker, where it had been always understood Lord Frederick Cavendish would some day have lived. The local clergy of all denominations also mustered well. Amongst the group surrounding the board marked "deputations" there were representatives of the Leeds Liberal Club, Derby Liberal Association, Sheffield Liberal Association, Chesterfield District Working Men's Liberal Association, Nottingham Liberal Union; the Notts Nonconformist Association, representing sixty Nonconformist Congregations; the Manchester Liberal Association and Junior Reform Club, the St. George's (Manchester) Working Men's Reform Club, Heywood Liberal Club, Leigh Liberal Association, Stalybridge Liberal Association, the Liberal Associations of Spotland, Chetnam, Pendleton, Castleton, Oldham, Rochdale, Heywood, and Bacup; and representatives of the Yorkshire College (of which the deceased nobleman was president) and Yorkshire Union of Mechanics' Institutes, of which he was vice-president, and at whose public meetings and conferences he made some of his earliest appearances as a public speaker. Almost every district of the North-West Riding (which the deceased represented) sent deputations; and there were also present several of the Duke of Devonshire's tenantry from the Yorkshire, Lancashire, Derbyshire, and Lismore estates. Most of the agents of his Grace were also present—namely, Mr. G. Drury (Holker), Mr. W. Laycock (Bolton Bridge), Mr. D. W. Harper (North-East Lancashire), Mr. J. E. R. Petyt (Bolton Abbey), Mr. J. R. Eddy (Carlton), Mr. Martin (Chatsworth), and Mr. Alfred Curry and Mr. C. Herbert Curry (sons of the Duke's legal adviser).

General visitors went at once to the churchyard, which, large as it is, was completely inclosed by a ranked multitude of miscellaneous sympathisers, most of whom, and particularly the ladies, wore some emblem of mourning. This barrier of spectators was kept in position by an inner cordon of men wearing white silk bands around their arms. Other persons distributed themselves along the route from the house, forming a lane through which by-and-by the funeral procession passed, and representing a total of probably from four to five thousand persons. In the absence of detailed organisation it was fortunate that Chatsworth Park presents such a choice of unbounded space; fortunate, too, it was that the thunderstorm which threatened at ten o'clock blew over, leaving the day to develop into perfect sunshine, and the beauties of the park under the full flush of spring to be seen at their best.

The special train of fourteen first-class saloons conveying the Ministers and members of Parliament left St. Pancras at twenty minutes to ten, and arrived at Rowsley Station shortly before one o'clock. Open breaks and two or three closed carriages were waiting to convey the members to Chatsworth; but Mr. Forster, Sir N. de Rothschild, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Stansfeld, and Mr. Holms preferred to walk the four miles. There were over 300 gentlemen brought by this Parliamentary train. Mr. Gladstone was accompanied by Mrs. Gladstone, the Speaker, and Lord Granville, Miss Gladstone having arrived previously. The Queen was represented by Lord Edward Pelham Clinton, the Prince of Wales by Colonel Kingscote, and the Duke of Edinburgh by Colonel Colville. Amongst the other arrivals were the Duke of Sutherland, the Attorney-General, Lord Rosebery, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Lord Kensington, Mr. Morley, the Hon. A. Egerton, Mr. Jacob Bright, Sir U. J. K. Shuttleworth, Mr. Childers, Lord Carlisle, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Sullivan, Mr. H. W. Fitzwilliam, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. J. G. Talbot, the Lord Advocate of Scotland, Sir J. Ramsden, Colonel Stanley, Sir T. Acland, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Northbrook, the Earl of Aberdeen, Earl Fitzwilliam, the Earl of Cork, the Earl of Dalhousie, Lord Sudeley, Mr. E. Ashley, Lord Crichton, Lord Colin Campbell, Lord R. Grosvenor, Sir John Lubbock, Lord Lynton, Mr. J. K. Cross, Mr. Armitage, Mr. Agnew, the Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley, Sir Patrick O'Brien, Dr. Lyon Playfair, Mr. Porter (Solicitor-General for Ireland), Mr. H. Richard, Sir Matthew White Ridley, Mr. Justice Williams, Sir James Ramsden, Sir W. Lawson, Sir G. Campbell, Mr. T. Storey (Lancaster), Mr. John Fell (Danehyll, Furness Abbey), Mr. W. H. Bowdler (Kirkham), and others. The better-known members, and notably the members of the Ministry, were frequently recognised, as they passed along, by a general lifting of the hat on the part of the people. The entire party were entertained at Chatsworth House previous to the funeral.

The funeral procession left Chatsworth at half-past two. The lady members of the family had driven in advance to Edensor Church. The venerable Duke of Devonshire at first walked alone behind the hearse, but after a while the Marquis of Hartington and then Lord Edward Cavendish advanced to his support. The funeral was one of complete simplicity. There were no scarves, drooping hatbands, plumes, or mutes. There was not even a pall for the coffin. The profuse use of crape was abjured by both ladies and gentlemen. The hearse might be described as resembling an oblong coffin of dull black wood, with deeply-fluted columns at the four corners, figures in high relief on the panels illustrating Scriptural subjects, and carved work on the roof, instead of the pompous adornments once common. The procession wound slowly along. The spectators uncovered while the hearse went by. Each of the four horses was held by a groom dressed in black livery, and the cortège was preceded by six policemen walking in single file. The family mourners, besides the Duke and his sons, were Admiral Egerton, Major Lyttelton, Lady Edward Cavendish, and Colonel Cavendish; Mrs. and Miss Gladstone and Lady Lascelles were with the ladies at the church. Mr. Gladstone, Lord Granville, and the Speaker walked together, the general body of members following four abreast. The procession, taking the lower road as the least hilly, arrived at the church shortly before three o'clock. The formal order of the programme—the only written programme of the day—was: his Grace's tenantry, the hearse, the members of the Cavendish family, the members of the household, the Royal representatives (including Colonel Kingscote, M.P., representing the Prince of Wales), members of Parliament, Lord Frederick's constituents, the constituents of the Marquis of Hartington and Lord Edward Cavendish, clergy, magistrates and gentry, deputations, friends. On the approach of the procession Lady Frederick Cavendish and the other ladies came into the porch of the church. Mr. Gladstone detached himself from his colleagues, and escorted Lady Frederick to the Duke, and Lady Edward Cavendish to Lord Hartington. In this order, closely followed by the other mourners, the party entered the church. The coffin was placed in the chancel, with floral cross and wreaths upon it, conspicuous above them being a wreath of rich crimson roses, sent expressly that morning by the Queen. The Edensor ladies, who had been decorating the church, added to the moss, palms, bamboo foliage, and ferns placed on Wednesday freshly gathered primroses and wild hyacinths from the Chatsworth coppices, and forget-me-nots from the banks of the Derwent and its tributary rills—welcome and eloquent substitutes for the unrelieved gloom of the traditional sable. The mourners and members of Parliament were more than enough to fill the building, and at least half the procession waited without, the doors being closed while the service proceeded. The officiating clergymen were the Hon. and Rev. E. S. Talbot, Canon Humphreys, Archdeacon Balston, and the Rev. J. Hall, Vicar of Edensor. The service was commenced by the chanting of a psalm, and, the lesson having been read by the Hon. and Rev. E. S. Talbot, the hymn beginning, "O let him whose sorrow no relief can find," was sung. The coffin was then removed, the "Dead March" in "Saul" (Handel) being performed on the organ as the procession moved out of the church.

The pathway leading up to the crest of the slope, where a few of the members of the Cavendish family sleep under unpretending monuments, was thickly bordered on either side by residents on the Chatsworth estate, selected individuals, holding at regular intervals the forty-one wreaths forwarded to Chatsworth during the week. That sent by the Queen was carried by the deceased's widow. Amongst the remainder were beautiful tokens from Sir W. and Lady Harcourt, Lady Spencer, Countess Strangford, Lady Balfour, the Baslow school children, St. George's Working Men's Reform Club, the Clapham School, and the Newport Market Industrial School. There was also an "In Memoriam" wreath from North-East Lancashire, and an offering from the Grey-Coat Hospital, Westminster. A space around the grave had been planked over for the accommodation of the principal mourners. Beyond this limit the portions of the procession which had been unable to find room in the church ranged themselves. Looking towards the church, the first intimation they had of the close of the first half of the service was the appearance of the upborne coffin slowly advancing above the uncovered heads of the lane of people. The sunshine seemed to concentrate upon the black velvet and golden handles of the coffin, and to rest softly upon the white, green, and crimson of the floral tributes. On the right of the grave stood the Duke, Lady Frederick Cavendish, Lady Louisa Egerton, and Lord Edward Cavendish. The Marquis of Hartington, Admiral Egerton, and Lady Cavendish were on the opposite side, with Lord Granville and the Duke of Sutherland close by. At the head of the grave stood the four clergymen in their white surplices and academic hoods. Within this circle, at the grave's brink, waited the tenantry selected to lower the coffin. The sad interest attaching to the spectacle probably absorbed the attention of all for some moments after the Hon. and Rev. E. Talbot commenced his offices. Prominent in the group was the Duke, leaning on his stick, his eyes ever fixed upon the coffin, and his white hair blown about by the wind. He and his sons bore but too obvious traces of the grief that has come upon them; but, though their lips quivered now and then, they succeeded in the effort of self-control. The ladies, too, were able to go calmly through the trying ordeal. Behind the clergymen stood Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, and the right hon. gentleman's preternaturally pallid face attracted not a little anxious notice. It was only when the hymn, "Brief life is here our portion," was sung by the neatly-dressed village children (wearing no other mourning than a band of white round the arm) that Mr. Gladstone, joining in one or two of the verses, seemed to rouse from his apparent lifelessness. As the body was committed to the earth, and the mould sprinkled on the lid to typify the return of dust to dust, there were many tearful eyes around.

The service over, Lady Frederick Cavendish dropped upon the flowers lowered with the coffin the wreath of roses sent by the Queen. Other wreaths were added at the time, and many during the afternoon, when thousands of persons looked into the grave. The mourners passed out of the churchyard into the Vicarage garden, where the Chatsworth carriages were drawn up. The Duke and his sons walked back to Chatsworth, while the members took to their conveyances, and hurried to Rowsley, from which the Government special train started shortly after four o'clock. The coffin lid being quite covered with flowers even before leaving Chatsworth, the public had no opportunity of reading the inscription:—"Lord Frederick G. Cavendish, second son of the Duke of Devonshire. Born 30th November, 1836; died 6th May, 1882."

In Edensor Churchyard there is little to distinguish the graves of the ordinary parishioners from those of the Cavendishes. The latter are on the top of the hill, and are plain earth graves. There is that of "Lord Richard Cavendish, youngest son of William and Louisa Cavendish. Born July 3, 1812. Died Nov. 19, 1873. Blessed be the name of the Lord." Alongside of it is that of Mrs. Louisa Cavendish, mother of the present Duke, with the inscription on the tombstone, "In the faith of Christ. Here resteth all that was mortal of Louisa Cavendish, daughter of Cornelius, first Lord Lismore, widow of William Cavendish, eldest son of George Henry Augustus, first Earl of Burlington, and mother of William, seventh Duke of Devonshire. Born Aug. 5, 1779. Died April 17, 1863. As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." The last preceding funeral at Edensor was that of the Duke's brother.

We are requested by the Duke of Devonshire to state that he, Lady Frederick Cavendish, and other members of his family have received during the last week numerous resolutions of public bodies and letters from private individuals expressing deep sympathy with them on the death of his son. It would have been a satisfaction to them to have been able to send separate replies, but their immense number has rendered this impossible, and they desire in this manner to return their most grateful thanks for the kind feeling towards them which has thus been manifested.

Miss Burke, sister of the late Under-Secretary, has received the following letter from her Majesty the Queen:—

"Buckingham Palace, May 10, 1882.
"Dear Miss Burke,—Though not personally acquainted with you, I am anxious to express to you again in writing how deep and sincere my sympathy is with you in this hour of affliction and bereavement, and how much I deplore the loss of one who had devoted his life to the service of his Sovereign and country so loyally, faithfully, and ably. It is impossible to express the horror which I, in common with the world at large, have experienced at the dreadful event of last Saturday; and whilst nothing can make up to you and to poor Lady Frederick Cavendish for the loss of a beloved brother and husband, the universal sympathy which is felt for you may, I hope, be soothing to you. Trusting that your health may not suffer, and praying that God may support you, believe me, sincerely yours, (Signed) VICTORIA."

FUNERAL OF MR. BURKE AT DUBLIN.

The other victim of this enormous crime was the immediate official subordinate of Lord Frederick Cavendish, an estimable public servant and an Irishman, who was doomed to share the fate of the Chief Secretary in suffering a cruel death at the hands of the Fenian murderers in Phoenix Park. On Tuesday week the body of Mr. Burke, the late Under-Secretary of the Government of Ireland, who is greatly lamented by all who knew him, was buried at Dublin, in Glasnevin Cemetery, by the side of his father. Before the removal of the coffin—which bore the simple inscription, "Thomas Henry Burke, born May 25, 1829; died May 6, 1882. R.I.P."—large numbers of persons were permitted to visit the room in which it lay. The procession left the Chief Secretary's Lodge at a quarter past nine in the morning. All along the route to the cemetery there were numbers of spectators who respectfully raised their hats as the hearse passed. Numerous wreaths of flowers had been sent in by ladies and others. These, including two large floral crosses, were placed on the coffin while it remained in the room awaiting removal to the hearse, and a few minutes later the mournful cortège started. The route taken was by the road leading from the Lodge by the Phoenix column, round the north boundary of the park, to the gate leading to the North Circular-road, and by the North Circular-road and Glasnevin-road to the cemetery. The few business establishments on the route were closed, and the blinds were drawn in most of the private houses. Policemen were stationed at intervals of fifty yards all along the route, and on either side. The cemetery was reached a little before ten o'clock. The members of the Cemeteries Board, dressed in mourning, and attended by the secretary, Mr. Coyle, and the superintendent, Mr. Malins, received the coffin at the entrance-gate. Each member of the committee carried a wand with a rosette of black and white ribbon. The funeral service was conducted in the mortuary chapel, which was crowded. The Very Rev. Dean Lee, P.P., Bray, assisted by the Rev. Edward Quinn, chaplain to the cemetery, read the burial service. His Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin was represented by the Rev. Dr. Tynan, his private secretary, and the Lord Lieutenant by Colonel Byng, A.D.C. The chief mourners were Mr. Augustus Burke and Lieutenant-Colonel Burke (brothers) and Mr. C. T. Redington (cousin). Although intended to be strictly private, the funeral was largely attended. Among those present were the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, Chief Justice Morris, the Lord Chief Baron, Lord Justice Deasy, Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, Judge Warren, Mr. Justice O'Hagan, the Attorney-General (Mr. William Johnson, M.P.), Mr. Naish (Law Adviser), Mr. W. B. Kaye, L.L.D. (Assistant Under-Secretary), Sir J. Power, D.L., Sir John Lentaigue, K.C.B., Mr. Cecil Guinness, D.L., Mr. Henry Roe, D.L., Mr. Henry A. THE FUNERAL OF LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH

Lord Edward Cavendish. Lady Frederick Cavendish. Duke of Devonshire.

II IN EDENSOR CHURCHYARD, CHATSWORTH.

OBITUARY.

SIR EDWIN HARE DASHWOOD, BART.

Sir Edwin Hare Dashwood, seventh Baronet, of West Wycombe, Bucks, died on the 8th inst. He was born Sept. 7, 1825, the only son of Mr. Edwin Dashwood, of the Royal Horse Guards, by Emily, his wife, daughter of the Rev. Robert Hare of Hurstmonceux; and succeeded to the baronetcy at the decease of his uncle, Sir John Richard Dashwood, Sept. 21, 1863. He was formerly in the 10th Regiment of Foot. Sir Edwin married, Oct. 25, 1853, Roberta-Henrietta, daughter of Sir Robert Abercromby, Bart., of Birkenbog, and leaves three surviving sons and two daughters. The eldest son, now Sir Edwin Abercromby Dashwood, eighth Baronet, was born Oct. 28, 1854. The title, which is the senior baronetcy of Great Britain, was conferred in 1707 on Sir Francis Dashwood, M.P. for Winchelsea, elder brother of Alderman George Dashwood, the ancestor of the Baronets of Kirtlington, county of Oxford.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Captain Thomas Bulkeley, of Clewer Lodge, Berks, J.P., on the 6th inst., aged seventy-five.

The Rev. Edward Stearns, D.D., on the 8th inst., at New House Park, Rickmansworth, in his eighty-fifth year.

Dr. Chadwick, Roman Catholic Bishop of Hexham and Newcastle, on the 14th inst., from congestion of the lungs, in his seventieth year.

Duncan Campbell, of Lochmell, Argyllshire J.P. and D.L., on the 11th inst., at his residence, Oxford Lodge, South Kensington, aged seventy-seven. He was the representative of the Campbells of Lochmell, the latest cadets of Argyll, who, in default of male descents of John, fourth Duke of Argyll, would be heirs to the earldom.

Amy Charlotte, Lady Edwards-Moss, on the 7th inst., at 1, Ennismore-gardens. Her Ladyship, who was daughter and heiress of the late Mr. Richard Edwards, of Roby Hall, Lancashire, married, May 18, 1817, Mr. Thomas Moss of Otterspool, who assumed the prefix surname and arms of Edwards, March 26, 1851, and was created a Baronet in 1868.

John Brown, M.D., Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, the popular author of "Rab and his Friends," on the 11th inst., aged seventy-two. In 1874, the University of Edinburgh conferred on him the degree of LL.D., and the Crown granted him, in 1876, a Civil List Pension of £100 in recognition of his literary merits.

Admiral John Townsend Coffin, Retired List, Royal Navy, in his ninety-third year. He was second son of General John Coffin, an officer of some distinction in the American War of Independence, and nephew of Admiral Sir Isaac Coffin, G.C.H. This gallant veteran saw much service, and is stated to have been the oldest officer in the Royal Navy. His capture of the French 74-gun ship Rivoli procured him the war medal.

Vice-Admiral Matthew Stainton Nolloth, F.R.G.S., on the 11th inst., aged seventy-one. He entered the Royal Navy in 1824, and attained the rank of Vice-Admiral in 1879. He served, as Senior Lieutenant of the Childers, in China, in 1843, and gained distinction in the operation in the Yang-Tse-Chiang. Subsequently, in 1852, he rendered valuable assistance in taking possession of the fortified town of Truxillo.

Mr. Jonathan Duncan Inverarity, formerly of the Bombay Civil Service, and for a period a Member of the Council of the Bombay Presidency, at Rosemount, Forfarshire, on the 28th ult., in his seventieth year. He was long in the East India Company's service, and held a prominent post in the Revenue Department. He married, in 1844, Martha Maria, eldest daughter of Sir J. Pollard Willoughby, which lady died in 1871.

Mr. Bright, as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has appointed the Earl of Fife, a member of the Council of the Duchy Court of Lancaster.

The Rev. Dr. Knight was on the 11th inst. installed Roman Catholic Bishop of Shrewsbury at the Cathedral in that town.—The Very Rev. Dr. Coffin, Superior of the Redemptorist Fathers of Clapham, has received a special communication from the Vatican, directing him to assume the duties of Bishop of the Roman Catholic see of Southwark. The Bishop elect has gone to Rome for consecration, and will make his formal entry into St. George's Cathedral early next month.

The Skye crofters charged with having assaulted a sheriff's officer, and with burning his summonses, have been convicted. Their arrest was effected by a force of fifty policemen specially dispatched from Glasgow. The more serious accusation broke down, and the charge was then framed as one of common assault, and on that the prisoners were found guilty, and sentenced—two to a fine of fifty shillings or a month's imprisonment, the remainder to twenty shillings fine. The fines and expenses of the defence were paid by the Celtic societies. An entire Skye township, numbering one hundred persons, have decided to emigrate to Canada.

The returns of emigration from the Mersey for April show that, great as was the stream to America and other countries last year, it is being surpassed in the present season. The total number of emigrants who left the Mersey in April was 38,865. Of these 32,228 proceeded to the United States, 6306 to Canada and British North America, 37 to Australia, 148 to South America, 53 to the East Indies, 2 to the West Indies, 33 to China, 55 to the West Coast of Africa, and 3 to the Cape of Good Hope. The nationalities of the emigrants were:—English, 16,734; Scotch, 161; Irish, 3972; and foreigners, 17,768; 220 not being distinguished. In the month of March the total number of emigrants was 20,410; and in April, 1881, the number was 35,610. Up to the end of last month the total departures from the Mersey were 73,198.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department of the Paper, should be addressed to the Editor, and have the word "Chess" written on the envelope.

F. B. (Matlock).—We are obliged for your note and the slip enclosed. The information you send for has been forwarded through the post in setting up the position. How can the White Queen be played to Q Kt 4th, as you proposed, from K R 3rd?

F. P. (Bradbury).—Your problem shall be examined.
J. B. B. (York).—Thanks for the games with Dublin; they shall receive early attention.
W. B. (Stratford).—Both letters received. The idea embodied in the problem is not worth the care and trouble it has cost you.

S. P. O. (Gosport).—A highly interesting game. We should be glad to receive many more like it.

F. G. (Midway Park).—Too simple, and incorrect besides. In the case of your last effort, suppose Black, in reply to 1. Q to B 3th, promotes the Pawn at K 7th to a Queen, how do you propose to mate on the second move?

J. S. (Bath).—Three checks in a three-move problem!
U. S. (Naples).—Your problems should have been accompanied by your proposed solutions.

D. A. (Dublin).—Next week, if possible.

L. M. (Saxels).—In the solution of your problem, after the moves 1. Q to K 6th, B to Kt 3rd, White can play 2. Q to Kt 8th (ch), and 3. K takes B, mate.

G. V. (Navenby).—No. 192 cannot be solved in the way you propose. After 1. Q takes B (ch), P takes Q; 2. Kt to K 4th (dis. ch), Black escapes by 2. K takes P. The author's solution is perfectly sound.

J. G. C. (Highgate).—The resemblance between the two problems is undoubtedly remarkable, but it were satisfied it is accidental from our knowledge of the young composer of No. 192.

T. A. (Sachsenhausen).—Maximilian-platz, Vienna, desires to play a game by correspondence.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 196, 1881, and 1900 received from H. N. Van Dyke, of Princeton, U.S.A., and of No. 193 from E. H. Lawrence, of Recloune, North-West Australia.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1992 received from E. J. Winter Wood, W. J. Haslam, Emile Fran, The Greek Casino (Smyrna), D. A. (Dublin), Pierce Jones, H. Stebbing, K. (Hidwater), and H. Evans.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1993 received from Adolphus Schroeder (Naples), F. E. Page, D. A. (Dublin), Pierce Jones, H. Stebbing, J. J. Hooker, and Pilgrim.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEM No. 1994 received from H. B. Shadforth, A. F. Mosley, Alpha, C. W. Crook, E. J. Winter Wood, New Forest, B. H. C. (Salisbury), E. WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

Letters of administration of the personal estate of Baron Nathan James Edward de Rothschild, late of No. 38, Avenue Friedland, Paris, who died on Oct. 25 last, without leaving any will, were granted in London on the 9th inst. to the Baroness Therese Laura de Rothschild, the widow. The value of the personal estate to be dealt with under the English grant amounts to upwards of £530,000.

The will (dated Jan. 23, 1877) of Lieutenant-General Robert Cannon, late of No. 14, Manor-road, Folkestone, who died on the 5th ult., was proved on the 28th ult. by Mrs. Emma Beevor Cannon, the widow, Ronald Cannon, the son, and George Richardson, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £74,000. The testator leaves to his wife £1000, and he confirms the settlement made on her; to his eldest son, Robert Langford, Dalzell £100, and he makes no further provision for him, as he is already amply provided for under settlement and appointment; to his executors £50 each; and the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for all his children except his said eldest son.

The will (dated March 15, 1881), with a codicil (dated Feb. 23, 1882), of Mr. Willis Henry Lowe, late of Marlborough House, Lower Addiscombe-road, Croydon, who died on the 4th ult., was proved on the 1st inst. by Henry Savory Way and Francis William Way, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £48,000. The testator gives his freehold residence, Marlborough House, to the Middlesex Hospital; £200 each to the Hospital for Women, Soho-square, and the Croydon General Hospital; and legacies to his sister, sister-in-law, niece, great-nieces, executors, friends, and servants. As to the residue of his real and personal estate, he leaves one third upon trust for the children of his late nephew, James Richard Kinchant; one third upon trust for his niece Lucrecia Boulanger, and the remaining third upon trust for his niece Janet Weston.

The will (dated June 22, 1865) of Mr. Joseph Harris, of Westcotes, Leicester, who died on Feb. 21 last, was proved on the 12th ult., under £35,000. Testator devises his estate at Westcotes, Leicester, to his son Joseph, charged with £5000 to the trustees of his daughter, Mrs. Jane Woodd, in addition to £5000 settled on her marriage, and £5000 to his said son's trustees; his land at Evington and land in the parish of St. Margaret, Leicester, to his son Samuel, subject to the payment of £5000 to his said son Samuel's trustees; and to his son William, his land at Countesthorpe, Barsby, Markfield, Worthington, and the residue of his real estate. He also bequeaths to his son William all his personal estate, subject to payment of debts, and legacies to clerks and servants.

The will (dated March 14, 1882) of Mr. Thomas Camp, late of Hatfield, Herts, farmer, who died on March 15 last, was proved on the 24th ult. by Arthur Ross Dagg, Thomas Camp, the nephew, and Henry Joseph Cock, the executors, the value of the personal estate being over £27,000. The testator bequeaths £6000, and his household furniture and effects to his wife, Mrs. Sarah Camp; his crops, stock, farming effects, and £6000, to his nephew, Thomas Camp; some shares in the London and County Bank to his great-nephew, William Camp; and £100 each to the Wesleyan Chapels at Hilton, at Etwell, Derbyshire. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be divided between his thirteen nephews and nieces, including the said Thomas Camp.

The will (dated Oct. 5, 1877) of the Rev. George Weare Braikenridge, late of Wincash Brisington, and of Clarendon, Clevedon, Somersetshire, who died on Feb. 19 last, was proved on the 8th ult. by George John Braikenridge, the acting executor, the personal estate amounting to over £24,000. There are bequests to his brother, sisters, cousins, godchildren, and friends; and the residue of his real and personal estate the testator gives to his sisters, Mary and Isabella Martha.

The will (dated Oct. 18, 1873), with four codicils (dated June 5 and 26, 1875, and April 10 and 28, 1876), of the Hon. Spencer Dudley Montagu, late of Hare Hatch, near Twyford, Berks, who died on March 31 last, was proved on the 5th inst. by the Rev. William Charles Raffles Flint, the surviving executor, the value of the personal estate exceeding £24,000. There are special gifts of stocks and shares to his daughter Henrietta Mary, and legacies to his son-in-law, father-in-law, executor, nephews, nieces, late and present servants, and others. The residue of his property the testator leaves upon trust for his daughter Mrs. Emily Jane Climensson. The deceased was the fourth son of the fourth Baron Rokeby, and heir-presumptive to his brother, the present peer.

The will (dated July 25, 1874) of Sir William Payne Galloway, Bart., late of Thirkleby Park, near Thirsk, Yorkshire, who died on Dec. 19 last, has been proved at the York district registry by Dame Emily Anne Payne Galloway, the widow and sole executrix, to whom he leaves all his real and personal estate. The value of the personal estate exceeds £5000. The deceased was member of Parliament for Thirsk, in the Conservative interest, from 1851 to 1880.

Sir Noel Paton, F.S.A., and Queen's Limner for Scotland, has been presented with the freedom of the city of Dunfermline, in recognition of his distinguished abilities and the eminent position which he has attained in his profession.

Lieutenant-General Galloway, Royal Engineers, has accepted the appointment of Governor of Bermuda; and will be succeeded as Inspector-General of Fortifications by Colonel Sir Andrew Clarke, who is at present in command of the School of Military Engineering at Chatham.

The Circumpolar Expedition selected by her Majesty's Government embarked on the Allan Line steam-ship Nova Scotian at Liverpool on Thursday week. Their destination is Fort Rae, where they will probably remain about fifteen months. The expedition was accompanied by Messrs. H. L. Barber, and W. Smith, engineer.

At the anniversary meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, which takes place next Monday at the University of London, the Royal (Founders') medal for the encouragement of geographical science and discovery will be awarded to Dr. Gustav Nachtigal for his exploration of Eastern Sahara, and the patron's medal to Sir John Kirk, her Majesty's Consul General at Zanzibar. The gold medal for physical geography will be presented to Herbert Llewellyn Smith, Bristol Grammar School, and that for political economy to Frank Herman Becker, Dulwich College.

Miss Alice Dods, of Brixton, brought an action in the Queen's Bench last Saturday against Mr. W. C. Woollett for breach of promise. After they had been engaged for some time the defendant entered the Army, and was ordered to join his regiment at Hong-Kong. Before leaving England he made several attempts to be married, but either he had not been living in the district or sufficient notice was not given. From China he continued an affectionate correspondence, which, however, suddenly ceased, and then the information reached this country that he had married. It was said that he had no means but his pay, about £120 a year. The jury assessed the damages at £200.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON: SATURDAY, MAY 27, 1882.

It is refreshing to turn for a moment from the laborious legislative failures—from partisanship and obstruction—at Westminster, to the brief record of the results of the international expedition that was last week gathered not far from Thebes, "the very cradle of astronomical research," to make observations in connection with a total eclipse of the sun. Although the time has passed when such celestial portents perplexed monarchs "with fear of change," it is a curious coincidence that at this moment the Egyptian Sovereign should be engaged in a desperate struggle for the preservation of his throne and dynasty. Happily, the political dangers that encompass the Khedive have in no degree diminished the hospitality shown to the scientific strangers who had come to the valley of the Nile to watch the great eclipse. The French, Italian, and English astronomers assembled at Soliag were happily rewarded for their enterprise and patient perseverance. Although the moon is some time in passing over the sun's surface, the period of totality lasts less than two minutes, and in this brief interval the most valuable phenomena of an eclipse have to be detected and recorded by the aid of the spectroscopic and photography. The atmosphere being perfectly clear, the results were entirely successful, and when the members of the expedition return to Western Europe, they will, no doubt, be duly revealed. The fragmentary telegrams that have come to hand indicate the discovery of a comet close to the sun—a scimitar in the sky, as native language picturesquely describes it—and of something like an atmosphere enveloping the moon. More important in its ultimate effects was the successful attempts to photograph the "corona"—the outer atmosphere of the great luminary—and its spectrum. The form of the corona, as it was observed last week, may be expected to throw further light on the relation between certain solar and terrestrial phenomena, and on the alleged sympathy between solar spots and the climatic features of the earth's surface. Perhaps also we may learn something further of those so-called protuberances which, like jets of red flame, are seen around the circumference of the sun, and are conjectured to be enormous emanations of hydrogen thrown off from its inner surface. There is little doubt that the careful observations of Mr. Lockyer and his brother savans will add something definite to our knowledge of the secrets of the stupendous orb on which we are dependent for light and heat.

The opening during the present week of the St. Gothard Railway, constructed at a cost of nearly ten millions sterling, is an event not unworthy of the special celebration at Lucerne, the terminus on the Swiss side, and on the borders of the group of Italian lakes on the further side of the Alpine range. Four days have been devoted during the present week to appropriate festivities—banquets, excursions, and illuminations—in which representatives of Germany, Italy, and Switzerland took a prominent part. Frenchmen were conspicuous by their absence on the occasion. France had already tunneled the Alps, and secured its own direct route to Italy through the great mountain chain at Mont Cenis, before the St. Gothard Railway was commenced, in 1872, and would probably have long enjoyed its monopoly, but for the disastrous issue of the Franco-German war, which enabled the three nations we have mentioned to come to terms, and plan the gigantic tunnel through the centre of the long circular chain that encompasses the North of Italy. The St. Gothard Railway is the shortest and most direct route from Germany and North Europe to the sunny plains of Italy, and will make Genoa "the Superb" a German port on the Mediterranean, as the Brenner and the Semmering lines have given the commerce of the Fatherland an outlet in the Adriatic. Of the four great railways that now pierce the Alps, the St. Gothard is the longest and most important. Whether or not the attempt to carry it out would have brought about a collision between France and Germany if the war of 1870 had not broken out, the event celebrated this week at Lucerne and Milan must have a distinct influence upon the political relations of the two great nations at either end of it. It will no longer be necessary for Generals or travellers to "scale the Alps." Engineering enterprise, it has been remarked, "has been at work about that great mountain chain with such skill and perseverance that a traveller can now sit still in his railway carriage all along the journey, and wake to be told that he has crossed the Alps without seeing them."

A public work of more humble pretensions, but of greater immediate interest to Englishmen, was inaugurated a few days ago, when our Sailor Prince officiated at the ceremony of lighting up the new Eddystone Lighthouse under the favourable auspices of a quiet sea and a cloudless sky. As everyone knows, quite a romantic interest attaches to the several erections on the dangerous Eddystone reef. Many of them were destroyed by the furious tempests that periodically rage against that projecting ledge of rocks far out in the Channel. To these assaults of the angry waves—in one of which perished Henry Winstanley, who designed the lighthouse more than a century and half ago—Smeaton's grand tower never succumbed. For more than a century it has withstood the winds and waves of the Atlantic. But, while the artificial structure remained an unimpaired trophy of the architect's skill, its rocky base was gradually undermined by the sea, and it is pleasant to think that the old lighthouse will be re-erected on Plymouth Hoe. The new structure, built by Mr. Douglass, the architect of the Trinity House, on another part of the reef, is an improvement on its predecessor in shape and appliances, and has been constructed in accordance with the scientific principles of the day. At the entertainment in the Plymouth Townhall which followed the ceremony at Eddystone, the Duke of Edinburgh was able to testify to the beauty and solidity of Mr. Douglass's Pharos, which it may be hoped will stand erect for generations to come as a friendly beacon to save life and property by warning passing ships off the dangerous reef that lies in one of the most frequented Channel routes.

Not the slightest clue has been obtained which promises to lead to the discovery of the Phoenix Park assassins, although arrests on suspicion are from time to time made. It is reasonably conjectured that the four miscreants who stabbed Lord F. Cavendish and Mr. Burke for obvious reasons keep together, and that very few outside a limited circle of conspirators share the terrible secret. It might be supposed that the greatness of the reward offered (£10,000) would, sooner or later, tempt the cupidity of accomplices; but it is remembered that as large a sum was many years ago offered for the discovery of the murderers of Lord Norbury, who have never to this day been discovered. Though outrages have not altogether ceased since the appalling catastrophe of May 5, there has been a remarkable abatement of agrarian crime in Ireland, and a stronger disposition on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, from Cardinal McCabe downwards, to denounce the spirit of lawlessness. But Ireland is still the country of provoking contrarieties and strange anomalies. Whilst evictions are being carried out with all legal appliances, and on a large scale, in Connemara, where the cottiers cannot extract a subsistence from the barren soil, Earl Spencer retains his popularity as a masterful Viceroy, who gently rebukes unreasonable national demands while the disgrace of a great undiscovered crime overshadows the country. Although his Excellency and his capable Chief Secretary, Mr. Trevelyan, have done nothing to excite popular ill-will, neither they nor any of the principal officials of Dublin Castle can safely move about the city and its environs without adequate protection against the machinations of secret conspirators.

It is lamentable to record that, at this grave crisis, the bitterness of party animosity and the baneful influence of Irish-Americans are combining to frustrate the beneficial effects of a conciliatory policy, and to paralyse much-needed legislation. With the second reading of the Crimes Prevention (Ireland) Bill, which, though opposed, was not obstructed by Mr. Parnell and his adherents, and was carried by a majority of 383 to 45 votes, the limits of forbearance seem to have been reached. Mr. Davitt, recently released from prison, has openly repudiated all compromise, and avowed his intention of prosecuting the conflict till Irish landlordism is extirpated. His colleagues in Parliament, instead of retiring from public life, as they proposed, seem resolved to make use of all the forms of the House to retard the bill which is intended to crush murder and outrage in Ireland. On the other hand, the Opposition have been obstructing remedial legislation. The measure relative to arrears of rent, which proposes to meet a pressing difficulty and to dry up a fruitful source of evictions, by assisting impoverished Irish tenants to clear off the incumbrances of the past, has been opposed not so much on its merits as on the ground that the proposed gift ought to be a loan. The alleged need for full discussion led to an adjournment on Monday night, after a protracted conflict. On Tuesday, when the question was resumed, the debate almost collapsed for want of speakers. Indeed, as much time was actually consumed in deciding whether the discussion should proceed as in considering the bill on its merits. Such strange anomalies, to use a mild term, do not redound to the credit of Parliament. The bills for repressing crime and giving relief to tenants have both been read a second time by large majorities. But the time wasted on Monday and Tuesday obliged the House, contrary to custom, to sit on the Derby Day. On the first of these measures the Opposition are anxious for progress, but they have been actively hostile to the second. The tactics of the Lamp League members are exactly the reverse. Between the two extremes the Whitsuntide holiday is postponed, if not endangered. Should the House of Commons be obliged to sit next week in order to pass the Crime Bill through its remaining stages, it will be only a further illustration of the folly and inconvenience that may be engendered by passionate party feeling.

ECHOES OF THE WEEK.

To all appearance there is something wrong in the acoustic properties of the House of Lords; or else—and it would be truly deplorable were this the case—there is a deterioration in the quality of the art of Parliamentary reporting. In the Peers, on Monday, Earl Granville, replying to Lord Stratheden and Campbell on "affairs of Egypt," as the Roman Rye put it, prefaced his remarks by what should have been a very entertaining anecdote. The Times reports his Lordship to have said:

When M. Thiers, the late President of the French Republic, was appointed Minister of the Interior under Louis Philippe, he revisited his native place, called on his old schoolmaster and asked him whether he knew him. The old schoolmaster said he did not. "Do you not remember the little Adolphe?" asked M. Thiers. "Oh!" said he, "you were the little boy that was always playing tricks. What are you now?" "I am a Minister," answered M. Thiers. "Why, you don't mean to say that you have become a Protestant!" exclaimed the schoolmaster.

The Daily Telegraph puts it that M. Thiers merely said to his schoolmaster, "I am a Minister," and omits all reference to the Dominie's alarmed inquiry as to whether his ex-pupil had become a Protestant; thereby losing the whole point of the story. The Standard says that the schoolmaster ejaculated, "Good heavens! you don't mean to say that you have become a priest"—which is, on the face of it, absurd, seeing that Romish ecclesiastics in France are not termed "ministers;" the Daily News report is identical, as to the "Protestant," with that of the Times; and the Morning Post cautiously leaves out the story altogether.

There is another version of the story which I remember finding many years ago in the "Random Readings" of the Family Herald; and, unless I am very much mistaken, the anecdote was re-told in this page, or in a leading article "in another place," in September, 1877, shortly after the death of the illustrious French statesman in question. It ran to the effect that M. Thiers, after his resignation of the portfolio of the Interior, went down to his native place, Marseilles, and visited his old schoolmaster. In the course of conversation the ancient preceptor said, "And you, my child, what have you been doing all these years?" "I have been Minister," replied, with pardonable self-consciousness, the historian of the Consulate and the Empire. "De quel culte?"—of what persuasion?—innocently asked the schoolmaster.

Mem.: The story goes thoroughly on all fours with that of the old fellow-student of Mr. J. E. Millais, who, after a long lapse of years, chanced casually to meet him in the course of a suburban stroll, and, telling him that he (the old gentleman) was doing very well as a drawing master in ladies' boarding schools in the North Western district, concluded by saying to the illustrious Royal Academician "And you, my friend, are you still interested in the Arts?" I tell the tale as it was told to me; and there may be another and a better version of it.

When I was young I was under the impression—and it was a very strong impression—that the proceedings of a private club of gentlemen were as strictly "tiled" as the mysteries of a Masonic Lodge, and that it was little less than high treason against decorum to make the internal affairs of a club a matter for public discussion. The impression of which I speak has been for many years and in many other matters of great use to me, especially in compiling these "Echoes," which may occasionally appear desperately dull because they do not contain a sufficiency of "scan-mag." Were I to turn this page into a "Society" one, and repeat in it a tithe of what I know and a fiftieth part of what I hear every week, I think that I could contrive to set "Society" London in a blaze in less than a fortnight.

Thus, holding Silence, under certain circumstances, to be, not only golden, but a diamond of the purest water, I am unable to suppress—what shall I say, my indignation?—well, my blank and sheer amazement, at finding that the private affairs of the Reform Club, Pall-mall, have been during the last three weeks, not only "tossed upon tongues," but made the theme for leading articles in at least half a dozen influential London newspapers, and I know not how many provincial ones. The Times, the Morning Post, the Standard, the St. James's Gazette, and the Saturday Review have all been editorially "exercised" about the Reform; and the Observer of last Sunday actually published in extenso those of the Club Rules which regulate the election of candidates. Club Rules published in a Sunday newspaper! Is the World coming to an end? I mean the World of Clubland, not that conducted by "Atlas," which journal has been honourably distinguished by reticence in an affair which, I take it, concerns the members of the Reform Club, and not the public outside. But to "Atlas," at least, one need not say, with Athenian Timon—

What, think'st
That the bleak air, thy boisterous chamberlain,
Will put thy shirt on warm!

The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress are to entertain the President and members of the Royal Academy at the Mansion House on Tuesday, the sixth of June, and very brilliant, I have no doubt, will be the gathering at the hospitable board of Sir J. Whittaker Ellis, Bart. Yes; the escutcheon of the Chief Magistrate has been emblazoned, since my last writing, with a "main coupée, gules." Sir J. W. Ellis has won his baronetcy very handsomely indeed. The generous splendour of his mayoralty has recalled the good old days of Alderman Cubitt; of Alderman Sir Benjamin Phillips—the latter admirable alike as a citizen, a magistrate, an orator, and a host; and the more recent fisti of Alderman Sir Andrew Lusk (the news of his baronetcy came to him on the very night of his entertaining Patti, Nilsson, Tuglioni, and a whole host of lyrical and literary talent); of Mr. Alderman Stone, Mr. Alderman Cotton, and Alderman Sir Francis Truscott. I have eaten the turtle of them all, and I have been honoured with a card for the banquet to the Academicians; so that, in the case of the Distressed Compiler, at least, it can scarcely be said that "Gratitude is a lively sense of favours to come." If you wish to be invited to a feast, wrote Mr. Thackeray, "ask to be asked." I recognise the wit, but fail to see the practical wisdom of the precept. If you have a mind to sit at sumptuous tables, the best course which experience leads me to suggest, is to decline four out of every six invitations which you receive. Your intending host will think that you are engaged to dine with some very grand personage indeed—say a Rural Dean, or a Registrar in Bankruptcy; and not only will he ask you again, but his sister-in-law, and all his second cousins will follow suit. These may eventually lead up to a Lord.

Mem.: This modicum of counsel is for the benefit of young men whose digestive organs are yet unimpaired.

Can any of my readers tell me, in the interests of bibliography, the date of publication of that very weird poem called "Napoleon's Midnight Review," which was illustrated in an equally weird manner either by Raffet or by Bellangé? The original is in German, I apprehend; but I have only read it in French. I ask because, in "Blackwood's Magazine" for July, 1825, I find a very stirring and dramatic set of verses entitled "The Campedor's Spectre Host," having precisely the same motive as that wrought out in Napoleon's "Midnight Review." The two first stanzas of the poem in "Blackwood" are as follows:—

On the Towers of Leon deep midnight lay;
Heavy clouds have blotted the stars away;
By fits 'twas rain, and by fits the gale,
Swept through heaven like a funeral wail.

Hear ye that dismal—that distant hum?
Now the dirge of trumpet, the roll of drum;
Now the clash of cymbal, and now again
The sweep of the night breeze, the rush of rain.

To the verses are appended a Greek Delta, the sign-manual of Mr. Moir, the author of the exquisitely pathetic "Casa Wappy"; and in a foot-note it is stated that "this slight ballad is founded on a striking passage in the Chronicle of the Cid. The idea is certainly a beautiful one, of the patriotic retaining a regard for their country after death and a zeal for its rescue from dangers and oppression."

Mem.: I can find nothing of "Delta's" either in the late Mr. Bellevue's "Poet's Corner" or in a very dainty and appreciative compendium of English verse, called "Poet's Walk"; the poems chosen and arranged by Mr. Mowbray Morris, which has been recently published by Messrs. Remington. Mr. Mowbray Morris, as an old Etonian, dedicates his book to Eton College; and indeed his fragrant garland is professedly woven for the delectation of Eton boys who have hitherto been apt to regard poetry less as a recreation to be enjoyed than as a lesson to be abhorred. But, oh, Mr. Mowbray Morris, could you not, while arranging your posy, have given a leaf or two to an old Etonian by the name of George Canning, and to a still older one, hight Thomas Tusser, author of the "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry," who thus wrote of the "distant spires and antique towers that crown the watery glade," as Eton was in the reign of Henry VIII.:

From Paul's I went to Eton, sent
To learn straightways the Latin phrase,
When fifty-three stripes given to me,
At once I had:
For fault but small, or none at all,
It came to pass that beat I was:
See Udall, see, the mercy of thee
To me, poor lad.

Few of the old English rhymsters have been more unjustly neglected than Tusser has been. Bellevue wholly ignores him; and quaint old Tusser has in modern times become a quarry for the philologists and the hunters after folk-lore and ancient proverbial locutions. Yet was there something of the true poetic ring in him who wrote the sonnet beginning—

Doth darrnell good, among the flow'ry wheat!
Do thistles good, so thick in fallows sowed;
Do taint-worms good that lurk where ox should eat;
Or sucking drones in hives where bees abide!

No more doth good a peevish, slanderous tongue,
But hurts itself, and noys both all and young.

Will "W. H. A. H.," the gentleman who many months—it may be years ago—the time passes so quickly—was so kind as to send me "for inspection" a copy of Charles Dickens's "Hunted Down," reprinted from the New York Ledger, for which the story was originally written, oblige me with his address, in order that I may return him, with many thanks, the interesting booklet which, unsolicited, he lent me. There is a mischievous and Puck-like fate that has to do with books. Innumerable times have I sought in vain for "Hunted Down." For two hours last night did I search, equally in vain, for a copy of the "Whole Duty of Man" (who wrote it?), which I feel certain that I possess; and in the midst of my quest up started, as though it had been the Bottle Imp, "Hunted Down."

A young lady, "T. L.,"—cet dge est sans pitié—referring to a remark made in the "Echoes" last week that there was no rule without an exception, triumphantly writes me that the letter q is always followed by the letter u; and that to this rule there is absolutely no exception. Of course the young lady is right, and I grovel in the dust of humiliation. Therefrom I pick up some scant crumbs of consolation in the remembrance that the consonant q is a "confounded foreigner," imported into our alphabet to the detriment of the sturdy Saxon cw—thus "cwellan," to quell. In an old English dictionary I find, "Although q is never sounded alone, at least in English, and never ends an English word; in some French names of places it is a final letter, and is sounded alone. See 'Acqs,' 'Cucq,' &c." Where are "Acqs" and "Cucq"? I cannot find them in the Gazetteers.

Mr. Charles Dickens's "Dictionary of Paris" seems to me to merit quite as much as did his "Dictionary of London" its sub-title of an "unconventional handbook." The quantity of minute but useful information which has been compressed into this little brochure of less than three hundred pages is really astonishing. Theatres, cafés, brasseries, picture-galleries, newspapers, the playhouse claque, the Mont de Piété and the Morgue, and hundreds more things Parisian, all receive ample attention; but they are written about in a manner totally differing from the ordinary (and intolerable) Guide-Book style. Touching the pawnbrokers, I may amicably hint to Mr. Dickens that the head office of the Mont de Piété is in the Rue des Blancs Manteaux, and that there is a nearer equivalent than "mettre sa montre au clou" for "taking your watch to your uncle." The closest equivalent to "au clou" is our "up the spout." But leaving a watch at one's uncle's is more fitly expressed by the graceful "chez ma tante."

Also, for the benefit of English tourists who might temporarily find themselves in a state of impecuniosity in Paris, should Mr. Dickens tell them, that the bureau of a "Commissaire du Mont de Piété" may always be known by a tri-coloured flag (usually a very ragged and dirty one) protruding from the house front and the particular storey thereof occupied by the functionary in question.

Upon the Morgue, likewise, is Mr. Dickens singularly interesting and exhaustive, although still, so to speak, within the compass of a nutshell. The opening remark on this grim subject awakens, nevertheless, a passing smile. "The Morgue," writes Mr. Charles Dickens, "as we now see it, dates from the year 1861. Before that time, it stood on the Quai du Marché Neuf, and was a most sinister-looking place." Dear C. D., would you be surprised to hear that in the year 1806 the Old, then a brand New, Morgue was spoken of as an architectural embellishment to the French metropolis. I find the "petit monument," as it is styled, elaborately engraved in Landon's "Annales du Musée." In design, it was a restoration of a meat-market built by Le Van, architect to Louis XIV. The older Morgue had been a hideous little subterranean charnel-house in the Cour du Châtelet. The greatest improvement in the Morgue built during the First Empire was the isolation of the public, by means of a high barrier of plate glass, from the bodies exposed to view. On this M. Landon grows quite sentimental. "This isolation," he writes, "converts the mournful scene into a chastened spectacle, un tableau adouci, which may be contemplated without terror by the weaker sex, and even by childhood itself." And this, C. D., was the Old Morgue, which you have stigmatised as "a most sinister-looking place."

Michael William Balfe, composer of "The Bohemian Girl" and of a score more English operas as beautiful and melodious, died on Oct. 20, 1870. I learn now, with deep interest, that the Dean of Westminster has acceded to the prayer of a memorial signed by the professors of music in the Universities, eminent conductors, musical critics, journalists, and most of the cathedral organists in the United Kingdom expressing an earnest desire that a tablet might be placed in Westminster Abbey "to the memory of a musician whose genius and achievements won for him during his lifetime a high reputation not only among his countrymen, but also upon the Continent of Europe." So Michael William Balfe is to have his tablet. He was only a musician. Had it been his business to mismanage the affairs of an empire, or to direct the indiscriminate slaughter of people who never did him any harm, he would have had his tablet—and his statue to boot, long ago. The present Dean of Westminster is to be congratulated on having so promptly and gracefully granted the request which Dean Stanley did not grant.

I am asked to mention that a Committee has been formed for the purpose of raising funds for an "enduring memorial" of the late Mr. Charles Darwin. The Committee state that "they are desirous of handing down to posterity the likeness of a man who has done so much for the advancement of natural knowledge; and they wish also to establish a Fund associated with his name, the proceeds of which will be devoted to the furtherance of Biological Science." An excellent design. I earnestly hope that it may prosper.

I scanned the Committee-list with some curiosity; and, following the Ambassadors, I find the names of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York, the Deans of Westminster and Christchurch, and several Canons and dignified clergymen of the Church of England. This is more excellent still. I wonder what the Inquisitors who condemned Galileo would have thought of the author of "The Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex." I wonder even what Bishop Blomfield or Bishop Philpotts would have thought of the illustrious man of science, in whose most important work it is inferred that "man is descended from a hairy quadruped, furnished with a tail and pointed ears, probably arboreal in its habits." I take the liberty (this being a free country) of not believing that I am descended from a monkey; but it is refreshing to infer that the Primate of all England and the Northern Primate appreciate the value of Mr. Darwin's teaching, and are anxious to establish a fund to be devoted to the furtherance of "natural knowledge" and "Biological Science" in the direction so luminously indicated by Charles Robert Darwin. This is a most excellent world, full of the most candid and single-hearted people imaginable.

I was speaking just now of Charles Dickens the Younger. A dear friend has just brought me from the United States a remarkable volume—it is a "stout" volume, too, of nearly six hundred pages—entitled "A Cyclopædia of the Best Thoughts of Charles Dickens." Surely in their study and culture, if I may call it so, of the Elder Dickens the Americans distance us a very long way. It is true that the other day I received a post-card from Newark, in the State of New Jersey, the writer of which missive gravely questioned the authenticity of a quotation of mine in "The Echoes," from "Pickwick," in which a clerical gentleman of bibulous habits, confined under a suspicion of debt in the Fleet Prison, offers, conditionally, to "eat his hat and swallow the buckle." My New Jersey correspondent mentioned that he had read "Pickwick" through three or four times. In reply, I advised him to read it through a fifth time, and he would duly light, in chap. xlii., upon the passage to which I had referred. But the majority of educated Americans do really seem to know their Dickens by heart.

OPENING OF THE NEW EDDYSTONE LIGHTHOUSE.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, as Master of the Trinity House Corporation, who have the charge of all lighthouses round the British coasts, visited Plymouth on Thursday week to open the new Eddystone Lighthouse.

The Eddystone rocks, which are of gneissic formation, consist of three reefs, the western, southern, and northern, with odd rocks dotted about irregularly. The old tower—Smicaton's, now in course of demolition—stands upon the northern extremity of the western reef. The new tower, just completed, stands at the northern extremity of the southern reef, the middle of the three. The whole group of rocks occupies nearly a square mile at low water, and stands a little to the north of a direct line between the Start Point in Devon and Lizard Point in Cornwall, being about forty miles from the former and thirty from the latter. The distance between the two towers, from centre to centre, is only 127 ft. The height of the focal plane of the light in the old house was 72 ft. above high water, and was visible thirteen miles, while that in the new house is 133 ft., and is visible seventeen and a half miles.

The new tower is from designs by Mr. James N. Douglass, chief engineer to the Trinity Board. The building has been entirely carried out under the personal superintendence of Mr. Thomas Edmond, the resident engineer, with Mr. W. T. Douglass as his assistant. It is entirely of granite from the De Lant quarries at Wadebridge, near Padstow, in Cornwall, with the exception of seven courses, in the lower part of the tower, from Aberdeen. A solid cylinder of granite, 44½ ft. in diameter, was first built up from the rock to the height of 2½ ft. above high water. From this, as a base, the tower springs, leaving a terrace, 4½ feet wide, all round.

Work on the rock commenced on July 23, 1878, and it was estimated by the Trinity engineer that the work would take five years to complete. This was the time allowed by the specifications which were issued to the competing contractors; although the Corporation eventually kept the work in their own hands. The foundation stones were laid, one by H.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh, Master of the Trinity Corporation; and a second by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, on Aug. 19, 1879; and the last stone of the masonry on June 2, 1881, or less than one year and ten months.

The Duke of Edinburgh, on Thursday of last week, started from London at four o'clock in the morning, and arrived at Plymouth at half-past nine. His Royal Highness went to the Millbay Docks, where he was received on board his old ship, H.M.S. Galatea, which at once moved into the Sound. She was followed there by the Trinity yacht Siren and the Harpy, which contained the Mayor and Corporation of Plymouth. The Carron, with the Mayor and Corporation of Devonport, and the Vivid, the yacht of the Port Admiral, Sir Houston Stewart, were waiting off the pier, and with the Triton, Trusty, Perseverance, and other Government steamers, joined in the procession, followed by a number of private steamers and by a whole fleet of yachts. The Galatea led the way, closely followed by the Siren, the Vivid and the Harpy coming next in order. The ships in port were dressed with flags from sunrise, and as the Royal Standard was hoisted salutes were fired from the citadel and men-of-war. The weather was brilliant. As the Galatea passed through the Sound, two American corvettes, the Portsmouth and Saratoga, which were lying there, dressed colours, and fired a Royal salute. The run out occupied about an hour and a half. The coast of Devon and Cornwall, from the Prawle Point to the Dodman, was distinctly visible, and the sea was covered with craft of all sizes, from tiny fishing-boats to ocean mail-steamers on their way up Channel. The Eddystone was reached at a quarter-past eleven, and the vessels grouped themselves around the reef. The Hercules tender and workshop, which lay in her accustomed place, was gaily decked with flags, and a line of flags stretched from the top of the new lighthouse to that of the old tower, which is to be removed and re-erected on Plymouth Hoe. The party on board the Galatea included the Duke of Edinburgh (Master), Sir Richard Collinson (Deputy Master), Captain Adkins, and Captain Nisbet; Mr. Douglass, the engineer of the lighthouse, and Mr. Inglis, of the Trinity House; Admiral Sir Houston Stewart and General Pakenham; Admiral Currie, the Commander of the American Squadron; Mr. MacIver, M.P.; Major MacIver, Captain L'Estrange, and the Rev. Dr. Wilkinson, Vicar of St. Andrew's, Plymouth. On board the Siren were Captain Burns and Captain Ladds, two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, with Mr. Edmonds, Mr. Edwards, and other officials. Altogether 9000 persons were present at the Eddystone at the time the light was inaugurated; but the ceremony was not participated in by more than a select few of those on board the Galatea, with the addition of Mr. C. F. Burnard, the Mayor of Plymouth. The Duke of Edinburgh landed on the Eddystone Rock about half-past eleven. A prayer was offered by the Rev. Dr. Wilkinson, the lamps were lighted, and the machinery which sets in motion the fog-bell was started by the Duke of Edinburgh. Everything was found in the most perfect order. The ceremony over, cheers were raised by the party at the lighthouse, and taken up again and again by the occupants of the steamers which lay around. The Duke then embarked amidst another round of cheers, and the start homewards was speedily made, the Galatea and the Siren being this time the last to leave. The run back was made at full speed, after the Galatea had steamed round the American vessels in the Sound, which manned yards in honour of the visit. Millbay Pier was again reached a little after two. Here an address was presented by the Mayor and Corporation of Plymouth, and His Royal Highness drove from the pier to the Guildhall to attend a luncheon, given by the Mayor, Mr. Burnard. The magnificent hall was splendidly decorated. The company numbered over two hundred, and included the Duke of Edinburgh and elder brethren of the Trinity House, Admiral Sir Houston Stewart, and other heads of departments in Plymouth and Devonport, Commodore Luce and the officers of American vessels in the Sound, the magistrates and members of the Corporation of Plymouth, Devonport, and Stonehouse.

THE FOUNTAIN IN ROUNDHAY PARK, LEEDS.

Mr. John Barran, M.P. for Leeds, who was Mayor of that great town from 1869 to 1872, and has taken an active part in local affairs during more than a quarter of a century, is the donor of a handsome public fountain, recently erected in Roundhay Park. It was in his Mayoralty that the Roundhay estate, which we described at the time, consisting of 1364 acres, was purchased by the Leeds Corporation, and was converted into a magnificent public park for the recreation of the townspeople. It was opened by his Royal Highness Prince Arthur, now Duke of Connaught, on Sept. 20, 1872, with great festivities, a regatta on the lake, a display of fireworks, and a banquet given by Mr. Barran to a large company of guests, comprising the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood. Mr. Barran has now presented the town with this Fountain, of which we give an illustration, and which will serve as a Memorial of the creation of Roundhay Park. The structure which contains the fountain, designed by Mr. Thomas Ambler, architect, of Leeds, and erected under his superintendence, is a circular Grecian temple, 18 ft. in diameter, elevated upon a platform of four steps; with eight Corinthian columns, having moulded bases and capitals finely carved, supporting an entablature and architrave, and cornice with sculptured decoration, surmounted by a dome of stone, with surrounding balustrade; there is a skylight at the top of the dome. Of the eight open spaces, between the columns, four are left as entrances, while the other four are occupied by red granite basins, each of which is supplied with water by an ornamental bronze fountain.

THE LATE DR. JOHN BROWN.

This agreeable and popular writer, who was an Edinburgh physician, died on the 11th inst. He was born in 1810 at Biggar, in Lanarkshire. He wrote numerous pleasant essays and sketches ("Home Subseque"), which have been collected in three volumes. The first volume is entitled "Locke and Sydenham and other Papers;" the second "Rab and His Friends and other Papers;" the third, published a few weeks ago, "John Leech and other Papers." One of his best-known writings is a sketch of dog-life and character, "Rab and His Friends," which was first issued in 1858, was translated into many languages, and reached a tenth English edition. Dr. Brown was a contributor to the North British Review, Good Words, and other periodicals. He was a Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and also of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. In 1874 his University conferred upon him the degree of LL.D., and in 1876 a Civil List pension of £100 was awarded to him in recognition of his literary merits. The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. John Fergus, of Largs.

THE SHRUBSOLE MEMORIAL FOUNTAIN, KINGSTON.

The town of Kingston-on-Thames was visited on the 1st inst. by his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, who came not only to open the Industrial and Fine-Art Exhibition, at the Drill Hall, and to be entertained with due honours by the Mayor of Kingston, but also to unveil the beautiful Memorial Fountain, shown in our Illustration. The sudden and lamented death, in January, 1880, of the late Alderman Henry Shrubsole, then in the third year of his Mayoralty, and in the very act of presiding upon an occasion of public charity, was followed by a subscription to provide some monument of esteem for his character and the services he had rendered to the town, in which his family have long held a respected position. Mr. F. J. Williamson, sculptor, of Esher, was commissioned to execute a design submitted by him, which was preferred from among thirty-six competitive designs. It represents a woman in classic Roman garb, of heroic stature, the figure being 8 ft. 6 in. high, with a vase upon her left shoulder, standing beside a spring, where a child, kneeling at her right hand, dips the water as it trickles through ferns and herbage, towards the receptacle for public use. The group of figures is of Sicilian marble, but the pedestal is of polished grey granite, which is more suitable for holding water; a part of the cost of this was defrayed by Mr. T. H. Bryant, one of the Committee, and some assistance was rendered by the Metropolitan Drinking Fountain Association. This work of art, erected in the Market-place, is much admired, and is certainly an ornament to the town.

THE JEANNETTE ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Lieutenant Danenhauer, of the United States Navy, and other survivors of the officers and crew of the steam-yacht Jeannette (formerly the Pandora) have just left England on their return home. The Jeannette was dispatched by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, of New York, in July, 1879, sailing from San Francisco, to explore the Arctic seas north of Siberia, and was crushed in the ice on June 11, 1881, in latitude 77 deg. north, longitude nearly 156 deg. east of Greenwich, at a great distance from land. Our Special Artist, Mr. A. Larsen, who accompanied Mr. Jackson, the Special Commissioner of the New York Herald, early this year, in a long and toilsome overland journey from Europe, across the vast breadth of Siberia, to search for the shipwrecked American explorers on the northern coast, and to convey the means of relief and rescue from their distressed position, met Lieutenant Danenhauer at Irkutsk, in February last. He was then furnished by that officer, and by Mr. Newcomb, the naturalist of the Jeannette expedition, with a variety of notes and sketches, part of which have appeared in this Journal. It will be recollected that, in June and July last year, after the destruction of the vessel, which had been abandoned by her crew the day before, they travelled southward over the packed ice, making for the coast of Siberia, having three boats on sledges, with other sledges carrying their store of provisions. In August, they reached open water, and embarked in their boats, one commanded by Captain De Long, another by Lieutenant Danenhauer, and the third by Lieutenant Chipp. The last-mentioned boat seems to have been lost at sea; but those of Captain De Long and Lieutenant Danenhauer, after a most perilous voyage and the endurance of extreme hardships, entered the mouths of the great river Lena, about the middle of December. The two parties were separated, having reached land at different parts of the coast; and it has recently been discovered that Captain De Long and his nine companions died last winter of cold and hunger, their bodies having been found by natives of the country. Lieutenant Danenhauer, Mr. Newcomb, Mr. Melville, the engineer, and some others, were fortunately able to get to the Russian station at Bulun, and received from Yakutsk, the capital of Eastern Siberia, enough assistance to keep them till the arrival of the Relief Expedition. Mr. Melville is still engaged at the mouths of the Lena in a further search for some evidence of the fate of Mr. Chipp's party, and for whatever might be recovered of the lost scientific records of the Jeannette's voyage. Our Illustration published this week is a sketch of the interior of a summer hut in the Delta of the Lena, where Lieutenant Danenhauer's party sojourned during six weeks, in the autumn or winter of last year.

Admirers of orchids have now an opportunity of seeing some choice specimens of odontoglossums and other orchids at Mr. William Bull's establishment for new and rare plants, at 536, Kings-road, Chelsea.

The anniversary dinner of the 1st (Grenadier) Guards' Club took place at the Freemasons' Tavern on Monday, Field-Marshal the Duke of Cambridge, as Colonel of the regiment, presiding, supported on the right by the Prince of Wales and on the left by Colonel Clive, commanding the regiment. The banquet was served in the great hall.

THE STEAM-SHIP AUSTRAL.

The latest addition to the Orient Line of steamers, the Austral, is a distinct advance on the Orient, the first of her type, not only in respect of speed, but in the structure of the hull, the ventilation of the state rooms, the arrangements made for the importation of frozen meat from Australia, and the effectiveness of the vessel as an auxiliary to our naval force. She has been built by Messrs. John Elder and Co., of Govan, on the Clyde, under the superintendence of Mr. J. W. Shepherd, a member of the Institute of Naval Architects. Her length over all is 474 ft., her breadth 48 ft. 3 in., and her depth moulded is 37 ft. Her displacement on the load line is about 9500 tons. She is thus 10 ft. longer, 2 ft. broader, and 2 in. deeper than the Orient, but, as her lines are finer, her tonnage will not much exceed that of the Orient. She is built throughout of mild steel, and has three steel decks. She is divided below the inner skin and the double bottom into nineteen separate water-tight compartments, and in the hull proper within the interior skin she is divided by thirteen water-tight bulkheads, ten of which run up to the level of the main deck. If the whole of the lower compartments were filled with water, the effect would be an additional draught to the extent of 18 in., and if the sea got into two of them, the stability and surplus buoyancy of the vessel would prevent her from being endangered. Above the main deck the ship is divided into seven fireproof compartments, all in communication with the main deck; and, as the pumping power provided is equal to 2928 tons per hour, there is ample arrangement made for flooding any of the compartments in case of fire, or extracting the water in case of their becoming waterlogged. In the event of the engines being disabled, the vessel is provided with four masts, the fore and main being square-rigged, and the mizzen and jigger having fore and aft sails, which, combined, will give about 28,000 superficial feet of canvas; thus the vessel is well under command independently of steam power.

These provisions for the general safety of the vessel are supplemented by unusual care for the comfort of the passengers. The cabins are all placed within the area of the ship, with a gangway, 4 ft. wide, running right along the vessel, outside the state rooms, and at frequent intervals across the ship. This permits each state room to be constructed like an ordinary compartment, with windows instead of portholes; and the porthole in the side of the ship may be opened even in rough weather without any fear of water entering the cabin. If a sea should strike the vessel when the porthole is open, the water will fall on to the gangway. Upon the upper deck, the gangway running round the whole of the vessel is perfectly open to the air, while it is covered above; and the passengers may promenade there with the full advantage of an open sea before them. The passage round the ship leads fore and aft on each side of the saloon, so that persons can go to either end of the ship without passing through the saloon. Beside this, there are numerous cross passages, three feet wide, between the several quadrangles of state rooms, an arrangement that offers unusual facilities for moving about the ship. The saloon is a handsome apartment, panelled with walnut and embellished with carved shields representing the arms of various nationalities. Arrangements are made for the usual long tables, but they can be also divided into sets of a dozen or even four seats. The most striking characteristic of the saloon, however, is the row of dome-shaped painted-glass windows down each side. These can be lowered at will in all weathers, because, instead of opening on to the sea, as usual, they merely admit air from the long corridors. Effective ventilation is provided for the saloon by a centrifugal fan, worked by a small steam-engine. The fan forces a continuous current of pure air into the apartment, and the foul air finds its way out through an ornamental opening above each window. The public rooms, the engine-room, pantries, and passage ways are lighted by the electric light, fitted up by Messrs. Siemens with nine arc lamps and 170 Swan lamps. Five of the arc lights are placed in the engine-room and four on the deck. The current is provided by two of Siemens' alternating current machines, each driven by a separate engine.

"BARLEY BREE."

The teetotal millennium has not yet dawned upon the world; and meanwhile the staunchest abstainer would doubtless prefer, as a patriot as well as a philanthropist, the general use of wholesome malt liquors to that of fiery spirits or foreign wines. John Barleycorn is still Lord Paramount among us, as shown by the many gigantic breweries in town and country, in whose leviathan brews Willie's "peck of maut," immortalized in song, would incontinently be swallowed up. Some particulars of one of these vast establishments, which a correspondent recently inspected, are here given; and from this example one may judge of all:—Romford, in Essex, enjoys the reputation of producing a beverage as pure and healthy as can be found in any portion of the kingdom. Its one brewery bears the same proportion to the extent of the town itself as the vast breweries located at Burton do to that enterprising centre of beer manufacture. In the case of Romford beer, however, there is the exceptional advantage that the trade is for the most part direct between the manufacturer and the customer, the beer being conveyed from the great stores at Romford to the cellars of the consumer, without passing through intermediary channels. Its freshness and purity are consequently to be depended upon. The manufacturing of beer at Romford is carried to the highest state of perfection. All that a skilful combination of science, skill, and capital can accomplish is to be found here. In the latter portion of the last century the predecessors of Messrs. Ind, Coope, and Co. began to brew ale and beer. It may be assumed that their elementary efforts were in proportion with a limited local demand. No one who then lived could have predicted the time when the manufacture of a great brewer would have a brand like those of the finest wines of France, Spain, and Portugal. No one foresaw the time when pale ale would be quaffed in the Himalayas and absorbed with grateful relish in the rock-hewn temples of Arabia. No sane person could have been found to own that a message from Calcutta to Romford by telegraph would bring out by first steam-ship and deliver within a month in India bottled beer to replace the costly wines of Southern Europe. But so it is. British beer may now be found not only at every table at home but in the most distant portions of our Eastern Empire. Some idea of the extent of the Romford brewery may be gathered from the fact that the buildings, railways, and area required for standing casks when filled, for which there is no room in the storehouses, cover 15½ acres.

Sir Garnet Wolseley, speaking on Monday night at the annual debate of the University College Debating Society (over which he presided), denounced military conscription as repugnant to the country, and unnecessary when they were able, by voluntary enlistment, to get 100,000 recruits yearly.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

The admirers—and their name is legion—of Miss Genevieve Ward have gladly welcomed the return to England from a lengthened professional tour in the United States of this excellent tragicienne and most accomplished lady. I learn that Miss Ward's latest transatlantic career extended over eight months, and comprised performances in some seventy cities. This involved a trifle of twenty thousand miles' travelling, including the voyage out and home. Next time Miss Ward crosses the "big pond," I earnestly hope that she will cross the "Rockies" and triumphantly descend the Pacific Slope. She would make a decided hit in 'Frisco, and all the other cities of the Golden State; and if on her return she branched off at Ogden, and gave a few performances of "Forget Me Not" at Great Salt Lake City, I fancy that her passionate and eloquent exposition of the anguish undergone by imperfectly understood women, would excite a large manifestation of sympathy from the downtrodden matrons of the Mormon community:—always supposing that Saint Abe would suffer his seven wives, more or less, to go to the play; or that the Mormon married ladies are down-trodden. Mrs. Stenhouse declares that they are so oppressed; but I have seen a good many remarkably strong-minded-looking females emerging on a fine afternoon from "Zion's Co-operative Dry Goods Store;" and I was shown a Mormon bishop, the billiard-ball-like baldness of whose cranium was ascribed by his intimate friends to his having had all his hair pulled out by the too prehensile hands of his numerous spouses. On April 25 last, Miss Ward, responding to an invitation from the Mayor, the Judiciary, and many influential citizens of New York City, gave her six-hundredth impersonation of "Forget Me Not" at the Union-square Theatre. She was supported, "on this occasion only," by a company of amateurs. The audience was brilliant, and the performance excellent. After some needful rest, Miss Genevieve Ward starts on a summer tour in the provinces; and at the end of August she will begin an autumnal tour, beginning at Birmingham, taking in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, Dublin, &c., and ending at Brighton at the beginning of December.

At the Vaudeville Theatre "The School for Scandal," having run its successful course, has been replaced by revival of "London Assurance," and this instant Saturday, the 27th, there will be an afternoon performance at Mr. Thomas Thorne's pretty house of Lord Lytton's comedy of "Money." New pieces of longue haleine seem to be woefully scarce; but of lancers de rideau there is no lack.

At the Globe, where Messrs. Hardy and Comyns Carr's "Far from the Madding Crowd" appears to increase in attractiveness every night, has been produced a new comedietta, by Mr. C. Marsham Rae, called "First in the Field." The piece has been, like so many of the flags in the hall at Chelsea Hospital, "taken from the French"; and the spoliation of the lively Gaul is candidly acknowledged by the author. Plot—two old gentlemen who think that one or the other of them is bound to marry their young and lovely ward. In the beginning there is mutual disinclination to be the happy man. Subsequent mutual jealousy—each wishing to be the Benedict—sets in. Ultimate triumph of the young and lovely ward, who only pretends to prefer one of her elderly guardians to the other in order that she may more conveniently secure a young husband of her own choice. Moral—"Crabbed Youth and Age cannot live together."

At the Criterion, Mr. G. C. Vernon has sought the public suffrages in a light, two-act comic drama called "Cupid in Camp," which ushers in Mr. Byron's merrily audacious "Fourteen Days." In "Cupid's Camp" the heroine escapes in male and military attire from a convent; while the hero, who has been mixed up in some political intrigues (the period is that of William III.), is fain to assume a feminine garb in order to avoid arrest. Result—an amusing series of equivokes. Miss R. Saker is the conventual pensionnaire disguised as a dragon, and Mr. L. Sothern the soldier in petticoats.

The beautiful and clever Mrs. Langtry, pursuing her provincial tour with more and more brilliant success, has enjoyed at Edinburgh a veritable triumph. I read in the Scotsman that when the lady closed her engagement, on Saturday night, the Theatre Royal was again packed from floor to ceiling, the audience numbering little short of 2000 persons. When the curtain fell for the last time the enthusiasm of the audience reached a climax, and, in response to the plaudits showered on her, Mrs. Langtry made the following speech:—

I should like so much to tell you before I leave Edinburgh how grateful I am for the kind way in which you have received me—really so much more than I deserved or expected; because, of course, I am quite a novice, and all the grand talent comes here from all parts of the world. I have only been on the stage a very short time—since Jan. 19, so that this makes my nineteenth week. Now, it is impossible to learn to act in that short time, any more than to paint a picture. I am as much surprised to find myself standing here before you as you must be to see me. I have a great deal to learn; but I shall work very, very hard, in the hope that next time I come here I may really merit your approval. I shall remember my first visit to Edinburgh with the greatest pleasure; and, indeed, I ought to feel quite at home here, for I am half Scotch. My mother is a Scotchwoman, and was born in this town. I am very proud of it. I can only repeat my thanks, and hope that it may not be long before I come back to this beautiful Edinburgh and "bonnie Scotland."

During the delivery of this impromptu speech, Mrs. Langtry, who had been presented with three bouquets, was again and again applauded. On leaving the theatre for the Royal Hotel, she was followed by a large crowd, who cheered lustily. Earlier in the day about 1500 persons had assembled in front of the hotel to see her go out for a drive; and on Sunday afternoon several hundred persons congregated for a similar purpose.

Really our male orators must look to their laurels. Mrs. Stirling has long been renowned as a "capital after-dinner" speaker; Mrs. Keeley "orates" admirably, especially at wedding breakfasts; Mrs. Kendal "spoke a piece" admirably at the Dramatic School Meeting at the Lyceum; and now to the school of Demosthenic ladies must be added Mrs. Langtry. MUSIC.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The return of Madame Adelina Patti is always a special event in our opera season, and its recurrence on Thursday week again drew a crowded and fashionable audience. The prima donna was enthusiastically received throughout her fine performance as Catarina, in "L'Etoile du Nord," in which her vocal and dramatic excellence was again displayed, alike in the sentiment of the first act, the deeper emotions of the camp scene, where Catarina, disguised as a recruit, is condemned, unknown by Peter, to be shot for insubordination—and, in the bewilderment of the last act, the recovery of reason and restoration to her Imperial lover. The co-operation of Madame Valleria as Prascovia, and of M. Gaillard as Pietro, were important features in the cast, which included efficient representations of other characters; among them of Gritzenko by M. Dauphin, Danilowitz by Signor Lestellier, the Vivandières by Mlles. Velmi and Ghiotti, &c.

The promised representation of "La Sonnambula" on Friday week, with the Amina of Madame Sembrich and the début of M. Massart as Elvino, was replaced by a repetition of Rossini's "Guglielmo Tell," in consequence of Madame Sembrich's sudden indisposition. The specialties announced for this week were Madame Patti's second and third appearances this week as Leonora in "Il Trovatore" and the heroine in Gounod's "Romeo e Giulietta;" and the production this (Saturday) evening of Bizet's "Carmen," with Madame Pauline Lucca in the title-character. It was on Tuesday evening that Madame Patti repeated that fine performance, as Leonora, which has heretofore proved attractive, and was equally so in this instance, when the house was crowded in every part. In vocal excellence and dramatic power nothing could be finer than the rendering of the character now referred to, which, however, is too familiar to need detailed comment. Mlle. Stahl, as Azucena, displayed signs of improvement, especially as an actress, and she will probably become a serviceable member of the company. As on many previous occasions, Signor Nicolini was the Munro, and the cast included M. Davies, who acted well as the Count di Luna, and gained an encore for his aria "Il balen."

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The series of German opera performances opened well on Thursday week, when Wagner's "Lohengrin" was given for the first time in England in its original language and by singers of that nationality—the work having been repeatedly performed at both our regular opera-houses in an Italian version, and more recently by Mr. Carl Rosa in English. In the Drury-Lane rendering the chief feature was the Elsa of Frau Sucher, who sang and acted with genuine dramatic power. In the recital of Elsa's dream, the recognition of the champion knight, in the great scene with Ortrud in the second act, and the still more important duet with Lohengrin in the bridal chamber, the lady's performance was of high excellence. Frau Garso-Dely as Ortrud declaimed effectively, with some occasional exaggeration. Herr Winkelmann was generally satisfactory as Lohengrin, as was Herr Dr. Kraus as Telramund; the cast having been efficiently completed by Herr Koegel as the King, and Herr Noldechen as the Herald.

Last Saturday evening "Der Fliegende Holländer" was given. This work has been spoken of in detail when brought out at Her Majesty's Opera (Drury-Lane Theatre) in 1870, in an Italian version as "L'Olandese Dannato," and subsequently as "Il Vascello Fantasma" at the Royal Italian Opera, and in English as "The Flying Dutchman" by the Carl Rosa Opera Company. The opera contains some of Wagner's most dramatic music, belonging to a period (1843) before his utter rejection of all classical models and precedents, as in his "Nibelungen" opera-dramas. Saturday's performance was generally excellent. Frau Sucher as Senta was fully as successful as she had been on the opening night as Elsa in "Lohengrin." The lady gave Senta's Ballad, her share in the love-duet with Erik; and, especially that of the great duet with the doomed Dutchman, with admirable dramatic feeling; her music in the closing scene of Senta's heroic self-sacrifice having also been finely rendered. Herr Gura's performance as the Dutch Captain was also admirable; both in its vocal and dramatic aspect. In the great duet with Senta, already referred to, he, together with Frau Sucher, produced a very marked impression. The subordinate characters were very efficiently filled by Herr Wolff as Erik, Herr Ehrke as Daland (the Norwegian Captain), Herr Landau as the Steersman, and Fraulein Schelsky as Mary. On Tuesday "Tannhauser" was very finely rendered, especially as regards the character of Elisabeth, in which Frau Sucher acted and sang admirably, particularly in the scene of the tournament of song, and in the last scene, in which her delivery of the prayer was full of pathos, the expression of grief preceding the death of Elisabeth having been given with true tragic power. Herr Winkelmann as Tannhauser declaimed finely, and acted throughout with great effect, his closing scene of Tannhauser's narration and his death having produced a marked impression. The music of Venus was well sung by Fraulein Wiedermann, as was that of the Shepherd by Fraulein Hartmann. A special feature was the excellent performance of Herr Gura as Wolfram, other characters having been efficiently filled by Herren Koegel, Landau, Wolff, Ehrke, and Noldechen. The chorus singing was very good throughout, and the overture and other orchestral details were admirably rendered. Herr Richter conducted with his well-known skill on each of the occasions referred to. Of the production of Beethoven's "Fidelio" we must speak next week.

The fourth and last repetition of Wagner's Nibelungen Opera-Dramas at Her Majesty's Theatre began on Thursday night, the three following performances having been announced for Friday, Saturday, and Monday.

The third of the "symphony concerts," conducted by Mr. Charles Hallé, took place at St. James's Hall on Thursday week, when Beethoven's pastoral symphony and other orchestral pieces were effectively rendered, among them having been a very characteristic "Rhapsodie Slave," by Anton Dvorák, a piece strongly tinged with a Bohemian tone, the nationality of the composer. Herr Vogl contributed vocal pieces with much success.

Miss Philp's evening concert, which took place yesterday (Friday) week at St. James's Hall, drew a very full attendance. The programme contained several new songs from her facile and successful pen. "Voices of Nature" (sung by Mrs. Hutchinson), "My Lady" (rendered by Mr. A. Oswald), "Whispered Words" (Mrs. P. Clark), "Music" (sung by the composer), "The Lover's Ride" (Mr. P. Blandford), and "Little Wanderers" (Madame Fasset), were all well received. Part-songs, by Miss Philp and others, were well sung by the members of the London Vocal Union; and miscellaneous songs and duets, &c., were rendered by the concert giver, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. T. Marzials, Mr. Maybrick, and vocalists already named; the vocal music having been agreeably contrasted by clever pianoforte performances contributed by Misses B. Waugh, A. Brown, and M. Johnston, and violin solos effectively played by M.

Ondricek. The conductors named in the programme were Sir J. Benedict and Messrs. Bendall, Morton, and Diehl.

Mr. Ganz gave the third of his orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon, when Liszt's "Dante" symphony was repeated, "owing," as announced, "to its great success." Our adverse opinion of the work was expressed in noticing its production by Mr. Ganz at his first concert, and we need not repeat it. The specialty of last Saturday's concert was the remarkably fine pianoforte playing of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann in Chopin's concerto in F minor, and some unaccompanied solo pieces. Vocal solos were rendered, with much refinement, by Miss C. Elliott.

An excellent ballad concert, in which Madame Patry took part, was given at the Alexandra Palace last Saturday morning; and in the evening "Il Trovatore" was performed.

Four Richter concerts of the new series have now been given at St. James's Hall. The programme of the fourth included the overture to "Tannhauser," and the "Venusberg" music written by Wagner after the original production of the opera, the same composer's "Siegfried Idyll," and Beethoven's symphony in B flat—all admirably performed. A specialty at the concert was Mr. O. Beringer's very fine rendering of Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat. Frau Sucher sang some lieder with much effect.

Madame Puzzi's annual concert, at St. George's Hall, on Monday afternoon, was of the usual attractive nature, and drew a good attendance. Several eminent vocalists and instrumentalists contributed to a varied programme.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society (conducted by Dr. Bridge) gave the final concert of the season on Tuesday evening, when the programme comprised Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and a miscellaneous selection.

Herr S. Lehmeyer gave on Wednesday evening the first of two pianoforte recitals in St. James's Hall; the second being announced for June 28, at the same place.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's sacred cantata, "St. Ursula," and his "Scandinavian" symphony, were performed, under the composer's direction, at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening. The cantata was produced with much success at last year's Norwich Festival, the symphony having previously been given, with the same result, in London, and recently at Vienna.

The last morning ballad concert of the season at St. James's Hall this (Saturday) afternoon offers unusual attractions.

The first Floral Hall concert of the season takes place this (Saturday) afternoon, with a varied programme, contributed to by several of the principal artists of the Royal Italian Opera.

The 148th anniversary festival of that excellent institution the Royal Society of Musicians is to take place on June 21 at St. James's Hall. Dr. Arthur Sullivan will be the president.

Mr. Harvey Löhr will give a chamber concert on Thursday evening, June 29, at the Royal Academy Concert-room.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

Paris, Tuesday, May 23.

The elements were cruel, as usual, last Sunday, the French Derby day. The morning was brilliantly fine; the ladies donned their finest clothes, and, enveloped in immense cachepousière, they braved sun and dust, and so to Chantilly. In the weighing-paddock, the pink of fashion, the world, the half-world, nobles and plebeians; in the tribunes, a kaleidoscope of bright-coloured toilets; on the course, a countless crowd. It was to be remarked that the ladies' dresses were very short and showed the shoes and a segment of silk stocking. The favourite colour seemed to be grey, of which there were many shades—iron grey, steel grey, "Freycinet" or mouse grey, so called from the nickname of mouse given to the amiable Premier. Hungarian green, too, seems to be coming into fashion again. The new stuffs with bright-coloured flowers painted, à l'aquarelle, on neutral grounds, were also noticeable. But really the posterior poufs, or, as Gavroche calls them, the tape dessus, are becoming enormous; how the women manage to sit down is a mystery. As for the hats, they are of all forms, amidst which the Directory dominates. But imagine, just when the bell rang for the Prix du Jockey Club—called "le Derby," nobody knows why—bang! A thunderstorm! A torrent of rain! The women screamed and made a rush for the tribunes; skirts were drawn unceremoniously over precious hats, masterpieces of millinery; umbrellas opened with a crepitating sound. The race-course looked like the shell of some colossal and grotesquely formed tortoise. The race was run in the rain, and the favourite, Comte Alfred, came in sixth, to everybody's disgust. The result was a dead-heat between the Comte de Lagrange's Dandin and M. Michel Ephrussi's Saint-James; Jasmin third by a head. Seventeen horses ran. The stakes were divided. And now, sportsmen, prepare for another surprise on the day of the Grand Prix.

Readers of Murger's "Vie de Bohème" will doubtless remember the character of Colline. The original model of this personage died last week at the age of sixty-one. It was M. Jean Wallon, author of a large number of works on philosophy and religious criticism. The necrology of the week contains another name well known to Egyptologists, that of François Joseph Chabas, who died at Versailles last Friday, at the age of sixty-five. After Champollion, M. Chabas was the man who did most for the study of Egyptian hieroglyphics. His monographs on the subject are numerous. Since 1874, he has published a monthly bulletin called L'Egyptologue.

Lieutenant-Colonel Th. Jung, author of an excellent work on "Bonaparte et son Temps," rich in new documents, has just published the first two volumes of a work called "Lucien Bonaparte et ses Mémoires" (1775—1840). The memoirs and notes of Lucien Bonaparte, numbering more than 3000 pages of manuscript, exist in the archives of the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It is there that Colonel Jung has found the material of his interesting work, which is to be completed in three octavo volumes. Lucien Bonaparte was the enfant terrible of the family—the grumbler, the scoffer, and the wit. His memoirs are always interesting, and full of the most valuable and curious documents concerning the men and events of the time.

The medal of honour of the Salon this year has been awarded to M. Puvion de Chavannes for his fine decorative work, "Lutias pro patriâ." An English artist, Mr. Stott, has received a third-class medal for two pictures, which have attracted much attention, "Le Passeur" and "Les Baigneurs."

A new play by M. Octave Feuillet, "Les Portraits de la Marquise," was successfully produced at the Théâtre Français on Saturday evening.

In the political order of things there appears to be a mild crisis. At yesterday's sitting of the Chamber, apropos of a recommendation of the committee to take into consideration certain bills for the reform or abolition of duty on liquors, M. Léon Say spoke with considerable humour against the recommendation of the committee. It might almost be said that the Minister of Finance lost his temper. The Chamber adopted by 271 against 151 the conclusion of the committee, and thereupon M. Léon Say declared that he would resign his portfolio; but to-day a vote of confidence in him has been carried by 302 to 36, and he will therefore remain in office. T. C.

THE MAY MOON.—SEE NEXT PAGE.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Green lanes and moorland, river and seaside, being most inviting in this brilliant month of May, their Lordships were wise in their generation to leave the Commons to their endless babble, and to separate on Monday for fresh woods and pastures new, not to mention the irresistible downs of Epsom. Ere they adjourned, however, Earl Granville indulged the House with the novelty of a few mild bursts of liveliness. Lord Colville of Culross having secured the rejection of the Railway Continuous Brakes Bill (which threatened to enforce the general adoption of the automatic brake), Lord Stratheden and Campbell gave the Foreign Secretary his first opportunity by moving for further papers respecting Egypt. Whereupon, Earl Granville dropped into anecdote, and applied the familiar story of Thiers and his schoolmaster to the noble Lord. Though the point of the application was not quite clear, a laugh was obtained; and Lord Granville was encouraged to enter an amiable protest against his Lordship's fondness for holding a "Sword of Damocles" over his head from recess to recess. The Earl of Derby having occupied a little time as a social reformer—the noble Earl obtained the second reading of the Boiler Explosion Bill—and quite a cluster of other more or less useful measures having been pushed forward a stage, the Marquis of Waterford rose to say he would hold over his question concerning the "Treaty of Kilmahinny." If the negotiations had concluded, would the Government lay the papers on the table? That was the purport of the query. And there was an approach to warmth in the remonstrance of Earl of Granville, who objected to the terms of the question, and in the neat rejoinder of the Marquis of Salisbury, whom the noble Earl sought by implication to saddle with the authorship of the inquiry in its original form. Yet in time for dinner did the brisk little skirmish end, and their Lordships adjourn till the first of June.

The Commons cannot get away from the interminable Irish question. Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, cheered when he took his seat last Thursday week on his return from Dublin and re-election for the Borden Burghs, was cheered again and again in the course of the earnest and able speech he made at the same sitting on the Government measure for Repression of Crime in Ireland. The eloquent young Secretary for Ireland spoke with force, lucidity, and judgment. His argument was that, whilst legitimate agitation, conducted in a Constitutional manner, ought not to be interfered with, it was absolutely necessary for the protection of the vast numbers of Irishmen who were sick of terrorism and longed to go about their daily work in peace and safety, to give the Executive the full powers asked for to punish criminals and restrain crime. This has been the ground taken up all along by Ministers; and generally approved by the Ministerialists and Conservatives, in the face of the steadfast opposition of the Irish Home Rulers led by Mr. Parnell and Mr. Dillon (the latter being the more resolute in his antagonism), aided by some of the Radical members. Fluently attacked by Mr. Sexton, and eloquently defended by Mr. Gladstone, the bill was read the second time on the 19th inst. by 383 against 45 votes—a majority of 338—the Prime Minister assuring Irish members it was the desire of the Government to pass the Arrears Bill as speedily as the Repression Bill. But when will the gravest arrears of all—the arrears in English legislation—be dealt with by the Ministry?

There actually was one subject concerning the Metropolis sandwiched between the Irish debate and Supply yesterday week. This was the vexed question of the Sunday opening of museums. A curious point about this matter is that (as was tersely indicated in Mr. George Howard's resolution) the boon prayed for has long been granted in the suburbs of London, where, being situated in the midst of the charming gardens of Kew and Hampton Court, a museum and a picture gallery may be reasonably deemed less inviting than they must be on Sundays in the centre of this wilderness of bricks and mortar, London. Yet the idea of yielding further to the Sunday opening movement was evidently so repugnant to the House generally that it needed but Mr. Mundella's Ministerial note against the resolution to cause it to be negatived by 208 to 83 votes. Meantime, it is to be noticed that what Parliament declines to sanction is being widely done by the liberal owners of public and private picture-galleries in London, many of which are thrown open on Sundays to the members of the Sunday Society.

The Lower House commenced the week with an all-night sitting, during which the many arguments for and against the Arrears Bill were presented with much force, varied towards the close by much noisy acrimony, on which it will be best not to dwell. The extensive nature of the relief the Government proposes to offer may be gathered from the figures Mr. Gladstone used on Monday in moving the second reading of the measure. Repeating that the estimated cost would be a million and a half from the Irish Church surplus and half a million from the Consolidated Fund, the Premier went on to compute that of the 50,000 tenants in Ireland whose rent was within the £30 limits, perhaps 200,000 were in arrears. At the heels of Mr. Gladstone's emphatic declaration that the money should be a gift not a loan, followed Mr. Slater-Booth with the amendment, seconded by Captain Aylmer—

That it is inexpedient to charge the Consolidated Fund with any payment except by way of loan with respect to arrears of rent in Ireland.

It was to be observed that whilst Mr. Forster had the satisfaction to find himself once more in perfect accord with his late colleagues on this question of arrears, Mr. Shaw was inclined to look the gift-horse in the mouth, and would have preferred him to be a partial loan. Without dilating on the clear and masterly, and thoroughly sympathetic, manner in which Mr. Trevelyan defended the measure as being welcome to distressed tenant and landlord alike; without dwelling on Lord George Hamilton's lively and pointed philippic against the bill as an economic mistake; I pass by the unbecoming wrangles of the small hours, and come to the adjourned debate on Tuesday afternoon. A grave, thoughtful, and statesman-like contribution to the settlement of this difficult question was the concise speech of Mr. W. H. Smith, who is known to have another panacea in his pocket. In the same serious key, which the subject eminently demands, Mr. Childers answered on the part of the Government; and, after a very different kind of speech from Mr. Lowther, still the enfant terrible of the front Opposition bench, Mr. Slater-Booth's amendment was negatived by 296 to 181 votes, a majority of 115; and the Government saw their Arrears Bill read the second time by a majority of 112—269 against 157.

The House, it should be remarked, had at the commencement of Tuesday's sitting been compelled by the Home Rulers to divide three times upon Mr. Gladstone's urgency resolution, which was approved, however, by large majorities on each occasion. Mr. Parnell, having taken part in the two protests against precedence being given to the Repression of Crime Bill, disassociated himself from his allies in the last division, which resulted in the adoption, by 254 to 15 votes, of Mr. Gladstone's Resolution:—

That the several stages of the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Bill and the adjourned debate on the Arrears of Rent (Ireland) Bill have precedence of all orders of the day and notices of motions, from day to day, until the House shall otherwise order.

Mr. Joseph Cowen, on the motion to go into Committee the same evening on the Prevention of Crime Bill, set himself the task of delivering one of his flowery orations in moving the following amendment:—

That, whilst this House is desirous of aiding the Government in any measure which they can show to be necessary to prevent, or detect, or punish crime, it disapproves of restrictions being imposed on the free expression of public opinion in Ireland.

Full of the peculiar rugged eloquence of which the hon. member for Newcastle-on-Tyne is a master, the speech was a wholesale condemnation of English rule in Ireland, and prescribed Home Rule as the best remedy. But why at this juncture (Mr. Plunket seasonably put it) recall with gusto the errors of the past in the misgovernment of Ireland? A majority of the House later on gave practical proof of their agreement with the Government proposals by granting a vote for extra remuneration of the Irish Judges by 92 against 21 votes. And still Ireland was not happy! On the contrary, till close on three o'clock in the morning was the House kept up, putting on the considering cap with regard to the Irish Poor Law Guardians Bill in Committee when the nightcap would have been more seasonable worn.

The Derby Day even was sacrificed to Ireland; and was remarkable for the Premier's dignified rebuke of Mr. Dillon's palliation of outrage and intimidation in Ireland.

THE MAY MOON.

Two or three poets like Moore and Byron, and probably two or three millions of inferior verse-writers, in almost every language and age of the world, have had their say about "the young May moon," and the effect of moonshine upon love. It produces, we are told, in "one short hour" a greater development of that emotional phenomenon than the broad sunlight of the longest day, which is the 21st of June; and the most recent experimental researches of physical science tend to confirm this calculation. The pensive young woman intently perusing a letter, or perhaps a photograph, by the aid of the full-orbed nocturnal luminary, as she loiters in the shrubbery while others have a game of whist, may be supposed to feel this lunar influence, of course in a proper way, "in maiden meditation fancy-free." When the fit is over, she will go in to supper, and retire afterwards to rest, neither better nor worse than the other members of the family, let the poet say what he will; nay, more, as Shakespeare puts them together, "the lunatic, the lover, and the poet," in spite of all three, with the May Moon to boot, she will prove a sensible person, after all.

THE CRISIS IN EGYPT.

The conflict of authority, at Cairo, between the Khedive, Tewfik Pasha, acting under the advice of the British and French Governments, whose naval squadrons are at Alexandria, and the Ministerial dictator, Arabi Pasha, at the head of the Egyptian army, seems now to be at the most critical point. Arabi Pasha threatens forcible resistance to the demands of the foreign Governments, though sanctioned by the Khedive's and the Sultan's orders; he has obliged all the native military officers at Cairo to swear that they will defend his Government against any intervention, but the Bedouin Sheikhhs have refused to take such a pledge. He has also made preparations for defence by sending artillery to the ports of Alexandria and Damietta, laying down torpedoes along the coast, and fortifying the citadel of Cairo. On the other hand, the Khedive, whose resolutions are instigated as well as supported by the French and British Consuls-General, M. Sinkiewicz and Sir Edward Malet, has successfully insisted upon the withdrawal of some acts of the Ministry and Chamber of Notables, and upon the resignation of the late President of the Council, by whom his Highness had been personally insulted. It is believed that a demand has since been made by England and France, or by the Sultan of Turkey at their request, for the deposition of Arabi Pasha from his Ministerial office, and from his command of the army; and further, that he should be sent into exile. Forty-three Circassian officers, including Osman Pasha Refky, late Minister of Marine, have been degraded and banished for a conspiracy to dethrone the Khedive, and to bring back his father, Ismail Pasha. Many English and other European residents at Cairo have already left that city, fearing that their lives might be endangered by an insurrection. The British squadron now at Alexandria, which arrived there from Suda Bay, Crete, last Saturday morning, comprises her Majesty's ironclad Invincible, flag-ship of Vice-Admiral Sir F. Beauchamp Seymour; the gun-boats Falcon, Bittern, and Coquette. The French men-of-war in port are the ironclad Gallionnière, flag-ship of Rear-Admiral Conrad, the Fourbin, and Aspic. The vessels still in Suda Bay are her Majesty's ironclads Alexandra, Inflexible, Téméraire, Monarch, and Superb, and the despatch-vessel Iris. Her Majesty's despatch-vessel Helicon was expected at Alexandria last Wednesday, with further orders. Several Turkish men-of-war, one with troops on board, have arrived at Suda Bay. The French gun-boats which were reported to be guarding points on the Suez Canal have signalled that they are only passing through the Canal. No precautionary measures appear to have been taken up to the present with regard to the Canal. It is believed in diplomatic circles that England and France, in notifying the Porte of the dispatch of a naval expedition to Alexandria, declared that no orders had been given to land troops, and that in case of such a necessity arising the Sultan would be applied to, to furnish the force required of Turkish troops.

Our Special Artist at Cairo has furnished the Sketches of the residence of Arabi Pasha, and of the equipage with which he drives out, with an escort of Colonels, to show himself on the public promenade; the figures of some of the soldiery, gendarmes, and others in attendance upon the Egyptian Dictator, are separately sketched on the same page.

Lady Brassey distributed the prizes to the Liverpool contingent of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers last Saturday evening on board her Majesty's ship Engle, lying in the King's Dock, Liverpool.

The Dean of Westminster, in reply to a memorial signed by several most influential English musicians, has, we are glad to learn, consented to allow a tablet to the memory of Michael Balfe to be placed in Westminster Abbey.

The Hove Commissioners have decided to borrow a further sum of £5000, to complete the new Townhall, which has been erected at a cost of £40,000. Bells with carillons are to be provided, and a great organ will be erected in the large hall.

The ship Orontes, Captain D. Bain, chartered by Mr. Saul Samuel, C.M.G., Agent-General for New South Wales, sailed from Plymouth for Sydney on the 18th inst., with 409 emigrants, under the supervision of Dr. C. H. Gibson, Miss Chicken being in charge of the single women.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty, before leaving Windsor for the Highlands, gave audience to Earl Granville and to the Lord Steward, who presented an address from the House of Lords. Sir Spencer St. John, her Majesty's Minister at Lima, on his appointment and on his being made K.C.M.G., and Colonel Mansfield, Minister at Carruccas, kissed hands on appointment. The Minister from the Republic of St. Domingo presented his credentials; and Mr. W. F. Douglas, President of the Scottish Academy, and Mr. John J. Jenkins, M.P., were knighted by the Queen. The Duchess of Edinburgh came to take leave of her Majesty, passing the night at the Castle; and Princess Louise of Lorne lunched with Queen on the day of her departure; her Majesty, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Princesses Elizabeth and Irene of Hesse, who had arrived from Darmstadt, leaving yesterday week for Scotland. The usual arrangements for the quietude of the northern journey were made; the Royal travellers having tea at Leamington, and breakfasting at Perth. At the Bridge of Dun a short halt was made, one of the axles having got heated. At Ballater a warm welcome greeted her Majesty, contrary to the usual reception; the Queen's expressed wish being to arrive quietly; but this being the first visit since her late danger, the district gave special significance to her arrival. Balmoral was reached at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, her Majesty having borne the journey well. The Queen has driven out daily, and has visited many of her old dependants and tenants. Her Majesty completed her sixty-third year on Wednesday.

The Lord Mayor of London has been created a Baronet, in consideration of the auspicious occasion of the opening of Epping Forest to the people by the Queen.

Sittings have been given to Mr. J. E. Boehm, R.A., for a marble bust, and to Mr. Alexander Bassano for photographs of her Majesty. Messrs. Downey and Son have also photographed the Duchess of Albany in her wedding dress.

The Queen has shown her approbation of the musical arrangements connected with the recent Royal marriage by presenting Sir George Elvey with a claret cup in memory of the occasion.

The Prince of Wales held a Levée, on behalf of the Queen, on Monday at St. James's Palace; at which some 350 presentations were made. The Royal party attending included the Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, the Crown Prince of Denmark, Prince Frederick William of Hesse, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Christian.

The first State Concert of the season took place at Buckingham Palace last evening.

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

The Prince of Wales, who went on a visit to Lord and Lady Carrington at Wycombe Abbey on Thursday week, was received at High Wycombe by the Mayor and Corporation, who presented an address, due military honours being given by the 3rd Battalion Oxfordshire Light Infantry (Bucks Militia), which battalion was inspected by his Royal Highness the next day, the Prince returning to Marlborough House in the evening. The Princess of Wales and the Crown Prince of Denmark went to Windsor yesterday week, and lunched with Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge. On Saturday the Prince and Princess and the Crown Prince of Denmark were present at the marriage of Miss Constance Knollys, daughter of General the Right Hon. Sir William Knollys, with the Rev. A. Knollys, at Lambeth Palace. Their Royal Highnesses attended the marriage, and breakfasted with the bridal party at Sir W. Knollys's official residence in the Royal Court, House of Lords; the bride and bridegroom leaving after for Birkhall, Ballater. The Prince a few days previously had attended the marriage of Mr. Frederick R. Knollys with Miss Carter Wood at St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, when he signed the marriage register, the newly-married couple going to the Bachelor's Cottage at Sandringham, lent to them for the honeymoon by his Royal Highness. The Prince dined with Lieut.-Colonel Sir James M'Garel-Hogg and the members of the Metropolitan Board of Works at Willis's Rooms on Saturday evening. The Royal family were at Divine service as usual on Sunday. After holding the Levée on Monday, his Royal Highness dined with the members of the 1st (or Grenadier) Guards' Club at the Freemasons' Tavern. The Princess and the Crown Prince of Denmark went to the Lyceum Theatre. Their Royal Highnesses and the Crown Prince of Denmark visited Princess Louise of Lorne at Kensington Palace on Tuesday. The Prince dined with Earl Cadogan at Chelsea House, Cadogan-place; and the Princess, with the Crown Prince of Denmark and Prince Frederick William of Hesse, went to the Comedy Theatre. Epsom was visited by the Prince on Tuesday, and on Wednesday he was accompanied there by the Princess and several of their relatives for the Derby, the Royal party travelling from Victoria Station to the race-course. The Prince had his usual Derby dinner at Marlborough House.

His Royal Highness has accepted an invitation from the Lord Mayor to dine at the Mansion House on June 17, when the Mayors of the United Kingdom will meet the Prince. His Royal Highness has also consented to unveil the statue about to be placed by the Mansion House committee to the memory of Sir Rowland Hill, near the Royal Exchange, on June 27.

The Bacchante, with the Royal Princes on board, sailed on Sunday from Athens for Suda Bay.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh were present at the annual sports of the Royal Naval College, Greenwich; and their Royal Highnesses visited Charing-cross Hospital on Wednesday, to distribute prizes to the medical school. The Duchess has visited several of the picture exhibitions during the week, and has been to Royal Italian Opera, and to the Comedy and other theatres.

Prince and Princess Christian went to the Haymarket Theatre on Tuesday evening.

Princess Louise of Lorne left Liverpool on Thursday, to embark on board the Allan Line Sarmatian, for Canada.

The Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz dined with the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough at their house in Berkeley-square on Monday.

The Duke of Cambridge had a dinner party at Gloucester House last Saturday evening, covers being laid for thirty.

Two new gun-boats, the Stork and Raven, were launched on the 18th inst. from the ship-building yards of Messrs. Samuda Bros., Poplar. These sister vessels, which have been built for her Majesty's Government, are of the same class as the Starling, launched from the same yards on the 19th ult.

A banquet was given by the Highland Society of London last Saturday, through the invitation of the President and directors, at Freemasons' Tavern, to the officers of the Gordon Highlanders and the officers of other Highland regiments stationed in or near London. The chair was taken by Sir Charles McGrigor, president of the society, and the company numbered nearly 200.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

In spite of the long spell of fine weather we have enjoyed, the Epsom course has seldom been in better condition than it is at present, and the few showers which fell early in the week just served to lay the dust. There was a capital day's racing on Tuesday, though it was one that was far more appreciated by book-makers than backers, as favourite after favourite was upset in ruthless style. Hauteur was the most fancied of the eight runners for the Woodcote Stakes, whilst Tyndrum, in spite of his excellent race with Rookery a fortnight ago, had few friends. The latter, who has the unenviable reputation of being a shifty, bad-tempered colt, did not improve his chance by bolting just prior to the race, and Hauteur succumbed to Beau Brummel, a son of George Frederick and Ma Belle, who ran well at Chester. The greatly-improved Tristan (8 st. 12 lb.) beat Retreat (8 st. 10 lb.) and two others very easily in the Epsom Stakes, and the Chetwynd Plate was very appropriately won by Sir George Chetwynd with Cosy.

The weather did not look very promising on the morning of the Derby Day; and partly on this account, and partly because there was a certainty of suffering more than usual from the plague of dust, there was a marked falling off in the number of people that travelled to Epsom by road. We imagine, however, that the railway companies profited in a corresponding degree, for there appeared no diminution in the attendance. As soon as the first race had been decided we went to the paddock, where most of the horses engaged in the great event were already walking about. Shotover was the first of the competitors that attracted our attention, and none of the fourteen runners were more universally admired. She is a slashing chestnut filly, with great length and liberty, and her grand hind quarters were specially noticeable. The cocky little Pursebearer did not have an extensive following, but he was trained to the hour, and looked as if made to order for the Epsom gradients. Marden made plenty of friends, and has grown into a grand colt, though he has a rather flashy T.Y.C. appearance. Next to Shotover, however, nothing pleased us so much as Fénelon, who is a grand colt, with power enough to carry a heavy-weight to hounds, and yet possesses plenty of quality. Dutch Oven is as lengthy and racing-like a mare as one could wish to see, but she was terribly light, and one glance at her ought to have convinced her most infatuated admirer that her recent illness had quite extinguished what would otherwise have been a splendid chance. There was general anxiety to have a good look at Bruce, and the favourite passed the ordeal with credit, though he has grown very little since last season. Executor looked like standing any amount of work, but he is a bit of a commoner; Psycho and Satrap were quite out of place in a Derby field, and Real Grit is a perfect wretch. We did not see Sachem and Gerald, who joined the others at the starting-post. The flag fell to a good start after a couple of breaks away; and well in front, on the rails, were the American pair, Sachem and Gerald. Directly, however, they got settled down Real Grit dashed to the front. He did not long maintain his position, because Marden and Bruce, going at their best, were soon some lengths in front, followed by Pursebearer; Real Grit, Sachem, and Quicklime, Shotover and Dutch Oven lying off in company with the outsider Satrap. The pace up to this had been a cracker, and at the furzes Gerald had had enough of it. As they came into the straight Bruce and Marden lost their places by running wide, and for a few strides Pursebearer was left in front of Quicklime, Bruce, Shotover, and Dutch Oven. The favourite, however, was well beaten a quarter of a mile from home, from which point Shotover and Quicklime came away together, and the former took up the running at the bell, winning in a canter by three-quarters of a length; a bad third; Bruce was fourth, and Gareth fifth. Thus a filly has won the Derby for the third time in a hundred and three years, and had not Shotover been withdrawn from the Oaks, she must have had a grand chance of repeating the Blink Bonny feat. Cannon had never previously ridden a winner of the great race, and the Duke of Westminster must be esteemed a wonderfully fortunate man to find a successor to Bend Or so quickly.

Cricketers were rather late in getting to work this season; but, once started, they soon began to make up for lost time, and, the long spell of dry weather having rendered the wickets too true and good to give even the best of bowling much chance, some extraordinarily long scores were made in various parts of the country. The Australians beat Oxford University by nine wickets, a result almost entirely due to the grand batting of Mr. H. H. Massie (206 and, not out, 46). Neither of these scores were made without one or two difficult chances being given, but both were splendid exhibitions of hard hitting. For the University C. D. Shaw (78) performed the remarkable feat of going in first and carrying out his bat. No one else did much in the first innings; but, in the second, A. O. Whiting (55) and C. F. H. Leslie (56) both "came off," and altogether the Oxonians, who are a very strong batting team, compiled no less than 423 runs in their two attempts, a very creditable performance against good bowling and the very best of fielding. Going on to Brighton, the Australians next met Sussex, and made a sad show of that very weak county. As their score is probably the largest that they will make during their present tour, we give it in full:—

AUSTRALIANS:
Mr. H. H. Massie, c Bettlesworth, b Blackman	45
A. C. Bannerman, c Trevor, b Lillywhite	60
Mr. T. Horan, c Humphreys, b Blackman	61
Mr. P. S. McDonnell, b Humphreys	11
Mr. J. M. Blackham, 1 b w, b Lillywhite	27
Mr. C. Giffen, c and b Blackman	74
Mr. W. L. Murdoch, not out	238
Mr. S. P. Jones, c Humphreys, b Lucas	5
Mr. T. W. Garrett, b Humphreys	9
Mr. G. E. Palmer, b Blackman	28
Mr. F. R. Spofforth, c Humphreys, b Greenfield	8
Byes, 17, 1-b 22	39
Total	613

We cannot say much for the Sussex bowling; still such a score as this is very remarkable under even the most favourable circumstances. For the county, Messrs. Whitfield (not out 54) and Ellis (52), and the Rev. F. G. Greenfield (23 and 31) were the only ones who could make runs, and all their efforts could not avert a crushing defeat in a single innings with 355 runs to spare. Derbyshire, which was very poorly represented, fared almost as badly as this at the hands of the M.C.C. and Ground, the club winning by an innings and 258 runs. Midwinter (not out 137) played a really splendid innings, and Fothergill (74) and Mr. E. F. S. Tylecote (64) also scored very freely. The M.C.C. and Ground also defeated Lancashire by eight wickets, and this time, Barnes (119) proved the champion of the victors; on the other side Mr. E. H. Porter (57) made the best stand. The representatives of the champion county are scarcely in form yet, as, going on to Cambridge, they were defeated by the University by 14 runs, after a very keen contest. The scoring was not very large on either side, and the fine batting of C. T. Studd (69 and 38) may be said to have won the match. The old rivals, Notts and Yorkshire, met on the Trent Bridge Grounds, and, after the game had gone all the other way in the first innings, the "lace county" pulled through by 90 runs. Morley was the hero of the occasion, taking six wickets for 33 runs, and Selby (66) headed the poll amongst the batsmen. A very strong team which had been got up to represent the Orleans Club must have beaten the Australians easily had there been time to finish the match. Mr. A. P. Lucas (not out 87) played splendid cricket, and Messrs. W. G. Grace and A. G. Steel bowled in rare form. None of the visitors did much except Mr. Murdoch (not out 107), whose brilliant defence saved his eleven from a single innings defeat. M.C.C. and Ground v. Yorkshire resulted in favour of the former by eight wickets. No large scores were made.

A great meet of bicyclists took place on Saturday at Hampton Court-green. The Metropolitan Clubs were numerous represented, and riders came from various parts of the country. Altogether three thousand five hundred were present.

On Monday and Tuesday evenings W. Cook and W. Mitchell played 3000 up level, for £200 a side. On the first night both men were in poor form, and Mitchell obtained a good lead; but on Tuesday Cook came out with splendid breaks of 156, 239, 114, 214, 303, and 224, and won by 778 points.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

ITALY.

In the sitting of the Chamber of Deputies on the 18th inst. the Army Organisation Bill was passed by 192 votes to 33. The House then discussed the bill for the recruitment of officers for the Army. It was agreed that young men of the first category, who have passed through the first class at a Lyceum or technical school, may, after eighteen months' service, be appointed sub-lieutenants and sent home on furlough to be called out in case of need. On Monday the Chamber passed an order of the day expressing gratitude to the projectors of the St. Gothard Railway and to those who had so ably carried the work to a successful conclusion.

The fifth International Literary Congress was opened on Sunday with a speech by Signor Ferrari.

In the Chamber of Deputies on Tuesday a bill was submitted fixing the strength of the Army during 1882 at 29,534 men.

AMERICA.

The House of Representatives yesterday week passed a bill prolonging the National Bank Charters for twenty years. Judgment in Guiteau's appeal was given by the Supreme Court at Washington on Monday. The sentence of death is confirmed.

CANADA.

On the 17th inst. Parliament was prorogued by the Governor-General. He expressed his belief that the members on returning to their homes would find the country prosperous. During the recess the Ministers would continue their efforts to secure favourable commercial relations with France and Spain, and would receive the hearty support of her Majesty's Government. Parliament would soon be dissolved, in order to allow the people to pronounce on the fiscal policy adopted in 1879, and to bring into operation the measure for the readjustment of the representation in the House. The Governor-General issued a proclamation last Saturday dissolving Parliament. Writs have been issued for the general elections.

Sir Alexander Galt, who has arrived in Ottawa, denies having resigned the post of High Commissioner for the Dominion in London.

From New Brunswick we hear that Mr. Harrington has been appointed Premier without portfolio; Mr. Macleod, of St. John, Attorney-General; Mr. Landry, Provincial Secretary, and Mr. Colter, Chief Commissioner. The elections have been fixed for June 22.

AUSTRALIA.

A telegraphic despatch has been received at the office of the Agent-General for Victoria, stating that the Hon. Graham Berry, having proposed a vote of want of confidence in Sir Bryan O'Loughlin's Ministry, the Government have had a majority of sixteen on the division.

Natal, in the elections recently concluded, has pronounced against the party in favour of responsible government.

Some terribly severe fighting is reported from Africa in the war between Bonny and New Calabar. A number of New Calabar warriors, who were watching the creek in their canoes, were surrounded by Bonny troops and all but annihilated.

Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen distributed the prizes to students of the Female School of Art on Wednesday in the large hall, Freemasons' Tavern.

The Royal Horticultural Society's great flower show of the season and horticultural implement exhibition was held on Tuesday and two following days. The band of the Royal Horse Guards was in attendance each day.

Sir John Holker died on Wednesday. He had been in bad health for some time, and had forwarded his resignation of the post of one of the Lords Justices of Appeal, to which he was appointed on Jan. 14.

The appointment of Colonel Brackenbury as Inspector-General of the Royal Irish Constabulary has been cancelled; and Colonel Bruce, late Deputy Inspector-General, has been appointed in his stead.

Sir J. M'Garel-Hogg gave his annual dinner last Saturday to his colleagues of the Metropolitan Board of Works and a number of distinguished guests, among whom were the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Teck.

Queenborough Pier was destroyed by fire yesterday week, and a vessel which had grounded close beside it was burnt also. The same day nearly half the village of Thorncombe, Dorset, was burnt down from a fire which originated in a baker's shop.

THE BOOTLE TOWNHALL.

The municipality of Bootle-cum-Linacre, a rising Lancashire borough, incorporated some years since, at the seaward extremity of the Mersey shore, beyond Liverpool Docks, has provided itself with a suitable Townhall. This was opened, on April 10, by the Mayor, Alderman W. Poulson, who was accompanied by the Mayors of several neighbouring cities and boroughs, the local members of Parliament, and the most influential residents of Bootle. We give an illustration of the building, which has its principal front in Oriel-road, and looks towards the busy docks and the broad river from which Bootle derives its trade and prosperity. The shipping in the Bootle Docks, the Mersey, and the opposite Cheshire shore, make a fine view from the upper windows of the building, while the stations of the London and North-Western (Balliol-road) and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways are in the immediate foreground. On the north the building has a frontage to Trinity-road, both that and Oriel-road being broad and commodious thoroughfares, though out of the line of the heavier traffic, which passes through the town. To the south and east of the building is a large open space, extending from Balliol-road to Trinity-road, and on these sides there is ample room for any extension which may hereafter be required. The general plan of the building will be understood if it be observed that the great hall occupies the angle at the corner of Oriel-road and Trinity-road, having the Mayor's parlour, committee-room, and council-chamber on the right, fronting Oriel-road, while the offices of the Corporation officials are to the left, fronting Trinity-road. The architect is Mr. Johnson, Queen Victoria-street, Mansion House, London, whose design was selected from among fifty competitors. The style adopted is the Renaissance of the period of Francis I., but omitting the exuberant details usually employed. The large hall affords room for public meetings, concerts, and lectures; it has a painted-glass window adorned with the armorial bearings of past Mayors of the borough, from 1869 to 1880, with room for those of the present and future Mayors.

THE BAXTERLEY COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

We have engraved the portraits of two gentlemen, Mr. Dugdale and Mr. Pogmore, his agent, who lost their lives in the brave and generous endeavour to save the men underground in the colliery that took fire at Baxterley, near Atherstone, in Warwickshire, on the 2nd inst. The disaster was caused not by an ordinary explosion of gas in the workings, but by the furnace of a steam-engine used for pumping, which set fire to the coal, so that the men below, of whom there were nine in that part, could not escape from the pit. At daybreak next morning, the proprietor of the colliery, Mr. William Stratford Dugdale, of Merevale Hall, went down, accompanied by his agent, Mr. John Pogmore, with the colliery manager, two mining engineers, Mr. Frank Pogmore, solicitor, son of the agent, and ten or twelve other volunteers, to attempt a rescue; but before they could accomplish anything three terrific explosions in quick succession inflicted on them serious injuries, and compelled them to retreat. Unfortunately, Mr. Dugdale and three others of the party were unable to make their escape before they were overtaken by the gas, and were, though brought up alive, so much injured as to cause their deaths, which are greatly lamented throughout that district of Warwickshire.

Mr. Dugdale, who was fifty-four years of age, was a country gentleman of high position and estimable character. He was the representative of two ancient families—the Stratfords, of Nunceaton, who had owned Merevale Hall since the seventeenth century; and the Dugdales, to which belonged the notable antiquary and historian of that name. The deceased was also brother-in-law to the new Chief Secretary for Ireland, Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, M.P., having married, in 1871, Alice Frances, youngest daughter of Sir Charles Trevelyan, Bart., and niece to the late Lord Macaulay. He has left two young sons and a widow. His father was M.P. for North Warwickshire from 1833 to 1847, and his mother was sister to Lord Portman. He was a graduate of Balliol College, Oxford, and had been called to the Bar; he was active in local public business, being Chairman of the Atherstone Petty Sessions and of the Board of Guardians, and was esteemed a kind and considerate landlord and just employer of labour.

The portrait of Mr. Dugdale is from a photograph by A. Bassano, of London; and that of Mr. Pogmore, sen., from one by Marshall Wane, of Douglas, Isle of Man.

A military tournament will take place in the Agricultural Hall from June 12 to 17, and will be opened by Princess Mary, Duchess of Teck. The proceeds will, as usual, go to the funds of the Royal Cambridge Asylum.

Lord Brooke, M.P., laid at Leamington on Tuesday the foundation-stone of a new theatre, which will cost £7000, exclusive of site, and will be built on the model of the Savoy Theatre, by the same architect.

THE BIG BELL FOR ST. PAUL'S: PROCESSION ON THE ROAD TO LONDON.—SEE PAGE 518.

THE BIG BELL FOR ST. PAUL'S: A REST ON THE ROAD.

ARRANGEMENTS FOR GETTING THE BIG BELL INTO ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

THE GREAT BELL FOR ST. PAUL'S.

The large bell manufactured by Messrs. Taylor, of Loughborough, Leicestershire, for St. Paul's Cathedral, arrived in London on Monday morning, having been eleven days on the road, drawn by a traction-engine a hundred and fifteen miles. On the first day, Thursday, the 11th inst., it got to Leicester; next day it passed into Northamptonshire, near Market Harborough; and on southward from Northampton, by Stony Stratford, Fenny Stratford, Leighton Buzzard, Dunstable, and St. Albans, to Finchley and Highgate, where it rested on Sunday last. The contractors for the safe conveyance of this ponderous bell were Messrs. Coles and Matthews, of Coventry, who have performed their task with entire success. The bell weighs nearly seventeen tons, and stands above nine feet high, with a circumference of thirty feet at the rim. It was placed on a massive trolley, with low iron wheels of great width; the weight of the trolley and bell together being not less than twenty-two tons. A traction-engine took the heavily-laden carriage in tow; another engine drew a covered van, or hut on wheels, stored with jacks and engineers' tools of all kinds, for raising or repairing the trolley, in case of need. Attached to the rear of this travelling tool-house, which served also to shelter the men at night, was a cultivator, made for steam-ploughing, laden with boiler-plates, which could be laid down to assist in getting the wheels of the trolley over soft ground. Last of all, came a cask-shaped tank, to supply the two engines in traversing country where water might be scarce. The strange procession excited great curiosity and wonder in the rural districts of Northamptonshire, Bedfordshire, and Hertfordshire. In some places, the local Volunteers' band turned out. The bell was piloted along the road by Mr. R. Coles, riding on a tricycle, and accompanied by Mr. Taylor, with several London newspaper correspondents and others. A photograph of the bell on its carriage was taken by Mr. F. Rubbra, of Stony Stratford, on the evening of the 15th inst.; and Mr. Richards, of Luton, took another photograph when it approached Dunstable. On Saturday afternoon, having arrived near Highgate, on the road from Finchley, the bell was met by thousands of Londoners, who came up the Archway-road to witness such an unusual spectacle. It was taken into the courtyard of the Great Northern Railway at the Woodman Station, and was left there till Monday morning, when it was brought at an early hour into London, reaching St. Paul's-churchyard at eight o'clock. The arrangements made by Mr. Penrose, architect and surveyor to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, for removing the bell from its travelling-carriage and introducing it within the south tower of the west front of the Cathedral, were not the least remarkable part of the undertaking. Some difficulty had been presented by the fact that the doorway into the tower proved too narrow by about 2½ feet, and the solid stone walls had to be cut away on each side, near the ground, while the masonry above had to be shored up with great care and ingenuity. Between this door and the spot at which the bell-carriage was drawn up, an elaborate timber slope had been constructed of beams 12 in. or 14 in. square, surfaced with slabs of oak, rendered slippery by a smearing of tallow and black lead. On to this slope the bell was dragged by the force of ropes and crabs or windlasses, but resting upon a circular wooden disk, to which it was fastened. The bell was thus enabled to slide slowly down in front of the door, and was then dragged up another short incline into the centre of the tower. The machinery for lifting the bell to a height of 125 ft. in the tower was very simple, consisting of two "crabs" from Woolwich Dock-yard, each worked by four men, two men at each handle, to haul the ropes, 2½ in. thick, through a series of blocks and pulleys, two above and two below. The operation would be done very slowly, but was expected to be performed on Wednesday or Thursday. There is a clear passage for the bell up the centre of the winding staircase in the tower. Its destined position is beside the clock, and below the present big bell of St. Paul's, which strikes the hours.

FOR BREAKFAST.
By thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operation of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicious and healthful beverage, which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal ailment by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and properly nourished frame.—(Civil Service Gazette.)
Made simply with boiling water or milk.

GROSVENOR GALLERY EXHIBITION.

SECOND AND CONCLUDING NOTICE.

A few works at this gallery which either deserve notice, or provoke criticism, remain to be reviewed. Among the latter must certainly be classed the more pretentious of the contributions of Mr. W. B. Richmond. Never was the danger of "vaulting ambition" more painfully exemplified than by this artist. Where he is content to simply transfer to canvas the nature he sees before him, as in the half-lengths of Mr. and Mrs. Lowthian Bell (194 and 198), he is perfectly acceptable, though far from great. But when, having to portray a beauty, or some distinguished man, or to deal with an imaginative theme, he conceives that some extraordinary effort must be made, some marked character or intensity of expression must be given—in short, some ideal treatment is necessary, he is at once stilted, affected, and extravagant. We need not point to other examples in confirmation of our remark than the seated three-quarter length portrait of Mr. Gladstone (77), in his red University robes, holding a huge folio—which is simply ludicrous. In this apparently colossal absurdity, the familiar pallor of the Premier's complexion assumes the grimy hue of a coalheaver, at least in the shadows, for the lights glisten with the perspiring glow of a fervid inspiration that seems to fix the eyes in a half-insane stare. The "motive"—though how degraded!—is clearly borrowed from one of the Prophets of the Sistine Chapel; and to see Michael Angelo so travestied is an offence against good taste of which we cannot speak in less measured terms. The large picture of "The Release of Prometheus by Hercules" (57) is also much more lofty in aim than in performance. The Titan sits on the rock freeing his stiffened limbs, from which the irons have been shattered. And the demi-god strides behind on a loftier pinnacle, discharging an arrow at the unseen vulture. The attitude of the latter is well conceived, but his figure is not of heroic mould; it is merely that of an over-trained athlete; and in both the anatomy is more demonstrative than correct. The "Cassandra" (123) of Mr. J. Collier is energetic, but she is scarcely the daughter of Priam. From these regions of classical fable and Homeric story to "The Weeders of the Pavement" (45), Mr. Boughton's best picture of the year, is a long but not unpleasant descent. The subject is a number of more or less saucy Dutch girls, under the inspection of a comical old harbour-master, plucking the grass from a disused landing-stage of one of the "dead cities" of the Zuyder Zee. The quaint figures, the toylike houses in the distance, and the turbid water, have an air of vraisemblance betokening close study on the spot. But, as in previous works, into the whole tone of the picture a tinge of green has crept; and the artist is apt to reproduce too frequently a peculiar blunt-nosed type of face. The "Entombment" (51), by J. Storey, has original features in the composition, and the execution indicates facile ability; but, as a whole, the work does not rise above clever conventionality. There is a good deal of merit in Mrs. John Collier's picture (103) of two little girls rehearsing their part in a pantomime or ballet in a garret. A small picture (163), by Mr. Alma Tadema of a little girl threading "Granny's Needle" (163) is charming in feeling, and in effect reminds one of an old Dutch master. Mr. E. Barclay's troop of Kabyle girls "Going to the Fountain" (162), is a pleasant reminiscence of his sojourn in Algeria, and very well painted. Figure-pictures by E. Wegelin; J. Chartran's brilliant, small portrait of his brother-artist, J. Storey (277)—misplaced among the drawings; and "Nora Creena" (118), by C. Halle, which is a great advance, also deserve mention. We hardly know what to say of Mr. Holman Hunt's full-length of a little girl holding an orange, with a lamb by her side, which he has christened Miss Flamborough (89), in allusion to a passage in the "Vicar of Wakefield." The artist's strenuous conscientiousness is apparent, but as obvious, we think, is the radical defect of a method which, in its heavy and positive equality of facture, admits of no transparency, no effect of atmosphere, no variety of texture, and affords no room for accident or suggestion.

A few works combining figure with landscape deserve note, particularly W. H. Bartlett's "Landing Corn," a scene at Roundstone on the West Coast of Ireland. This is full of daylight, and a very vigorous solid piece of work; it bears out the promise this young artist has recently presented. W. J. Hennessy's "Spring Calvados" (81) is very refined in colour, and idyllic in sentiment. G. Clausen may have been thinking of Bastien Lepage when painting the "Gleaners" (97), but there is a sense of beauty in the figures which would not be found in the French painter's works. In landscape pur et simple, a prominent place is due to J. W. North's "Autumn Days" (71), in which the multitudinous and intricate detail of Nature, and its endless variety of growths, are rendered with the artist's customary delicacy, and at the same time reconciled with requirements of breadth—breadth that is no less characteristic of Nature, and no less essential in a picture—to which he has seldom so well conformed. C. N. Hemy's "Oporto" (100) is open to much the same objection as Holman Hunt's portrait, the prosaic heavy-handed equality of the execution is completely destructive of aerial perspective. H. Moore's "After a Storm—Calm" (179) is such a subject as he has often painted; yet always welcome is the truth we have here in the action of the waves, and in the effect and colour of the light, especially where it impinges on or is reflected by the subsiding breakers. Walter Crane's "Dunstanborough Castle" (133) has technical shortcomings, which, however, are in great measure redeemed by the artistic feeling displayed. E. H. Fahey's "Wroxham Broad, Norfolk" (19), if rather hard, is admirable for the truthful relations of tone between the brimming water, the rainy sky, and the darkling trees. K. Hallswelle's unpicturesquely chosen view of "Shooter's Hill" (33) is monotonous in colour, as usual, but its effectiveness is more legitimately obtained than is the artist's wont. Still, in landscape of this sort we miss all touch of beauty, sentiment, or refinement. We must recognise artistic perceptions or sympathies in Cecil Lawson's landscapes, whatever may be said of his plagiaristic tendency, and his practice. We should say that he admires the grandiose classical landscape of G. Poussin, judging by "The Storm Cloud" (30); and, looking at the audacious use of pigments in the sky of another picture, we should infer that he had looked closely at the later works of Jules Dupré, and other French jugglers with colours and impasto. But these crude, painty, or juicy skies, and these dirty, heavy greens, are not derived from nature; and much more knowledge is necessary to sustain pretention to so much mastery. In still-life, W. Hughes has the field almost all to himself—saving two small, highly-finished, brilliant pictures of roses (42) and grapes (48), by W. J. Muckley. "Fruits of Italy" (228), Mr. Hughes's largest contribution, represents a gorgeous array of melons, gourds, grapes, fasci of wine, &c., on the stall of a shop in an Italian street. It is well composed and painted in a masculine manner; and if the reds were a little subdued, the colouring would be not less satisfactory. But more original is this artist's decorative panels, especially the "Golden Pippins" (287) and "Cobnuts" (288), the greyish green of the foliage in which forms a chaste harmony with the greenish gold of the ground, and indicate a true sense of colour. Among the sculpture there is little demanding attention besides Count Gleichen's promising model for a statue of Hero holding aloft the torch as a beacon for Leander, and Mr. Boehm's sketches for the statues of General Sir John Burgoyne and Lord Beaconsfield for Westminster Abbey. Mr. Legros was ill-advised to exhibit, even in sketch form, anything so weak and inchoate as "La Source." It is all very well for Mr. Boehm to exhibit—if he can afford to do so (as he can)—such a rough first-thought in portraiture as his Lord Beaconsfield; but we look, even in the inception of an ideal work, for some originality of motive, or some indication of feeling or knowledge in modelling, but in this "Source" we have not the first, second, or third.

Mr. J. J. Tissot is exhibiting a collection of his oil-paintings, water-colour drawings, and etchings, and also some cloisonné enamels, to the production of which he has lately turned his attention, in the Dudley Gallery. Among the paintings not previously exhibited is a series of four illustrating "The Prodigal Son in Modern Life." We regret we have not space to notice in detail the collection—which is displayed with a taste in the arrangements that is rarely seen in this country.

In the upper room at the Egyptian Hall Mr. A. MacCallum is exhibiting a collection of his oil-paintings and drawings. The most important new picture is a representation of "The Major Oak of Sherwood Forest"—i.e., the gigantic oak of Sherwood Forest, seen under evening effect after a storm.

At the Gallery, 168, New Broad-street, is being shown a number of Tapestry Paintings, by Mr. B. Grénié and his assistants. They are mostly copies from pictures or old tapestries, and many are excellent. As they are inexpensive, compared to the cost of real tapestries, and the colours are washable, the application of the process for purposes of decoration is obvious.

The seventh annual Exhibition of Paintings on China by lady amateurs and artists was opened on Monday at Messrs. Howell and James's, Regent-street.

The Archdeacon of Middlesex delivered his charge to the clergy of the Archdeaconry in the Church of St. Paul, Covent Garden, on Tuesday.

Judgment was given by the House of Lords on Monday in the Bordesley ritual case, the Lord Chancellor and Lords Blackburn, Bramwell, and Watson unanimously upholding the judgment of Lord Penzance and dismissing the appeal.

A committee has been formed in London for the purpose of raising funds towards the preservation of Blythburgh Church, Suffolk, which has fallen into a ruinous condition. Subscriptions will be gladly acknowledged by the hon. secretary of the fund, 4, Garden-court, Temple, E.C.

On the evening of Ascension Day a most impressive service was held at St. Sepulchre's Church, Holborn Viaduct. The choir, which is always a really excellent one, was strengthened by the addition of a hundred voices, and acquitted itself admirably. For the Anthem was performed a selection from Handel's oratorio, "The Messiah." Dr. C. J. Frost presided at the organ; and Mr. Loaring, the organist, conducted.

The Church of St. Mary, Sedgeford, in the diocese of Norwich, has been reopened, after having been closed for restoration for twelve months. The church is one of special architectural interest, and much care has been taken to preserve all that is valuable in it, and to restore it to something of the grandeur of which it was in great measure deprived at the last restoration, some forty years ago. The nave and aisles have been in the hands of Mr. F. Freedy, and the chancel in those of Mr. E. Christian, the architect of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are large owners of land and tithes in the parish, and who have contributed one half of the £2000 which have been expended upon the work.

Wetherall church, Cumberland, which has been restored under the direction of Mr. Withers, has been reopened. The chancel was dealt with by the Chapter about ten years ago, and the work has now been completed through the exertions of the Rector (the Rev. W. Blake), who has raised £2000 for the purpose. The church contains a memorial of John Hodgson, who had been clerk of the parish for fifty-six years. During that time he officiated under fifty-three different clergymen, and never missed a single Sunday service. He was present at 5013 christenings, 2112 marriages, and 4699 funerals. He died in July, 1864.

The painted window, presented by the Cordwainers' Company to the Church of St. Dunstan's, Fleet-street, was unveiled on the 16th inst., in the presence of the Master and the court of assistants. The "Good Samaritan" is the subject of the window, which is from the studio of Mr. Taylor, of Berners-street, the original drawing being in the exhibition of the Royal Academy this year.—West Newton church has been restored, at the cost of the Prince of Wales, by A. W. Blomfield. Two stained-glass windows have been placed in the church—one, illustrating the subjects of the Baptism of Our Lord and the Passover, is the joint gift of the Duke and Duchess of Connaught, Prince and Princess Christian, and Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne; in the other window, the gift of Mr. Christopher Sykes, M.P., is the subject of the Crucifixion. These windows were designed and executed by Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Bayne, under the supervision of Mr. Blomfield.

A Court of Assistants of the Sons of the Clergy Charity was held at the Corporation House, Bloomsbury-place, last Saturday.—Earl Powis, vice-president of the Society, presiding. The main business of the court was the consideration of the applications of widows and aged single daughters of clergymen to be elected to the pensions rendered vacant by death or resignation during the past year. The total number of these pensions is 712, and there were thirty-six vacancies to be filled up. Mr. Paget Bowman, the registrar, submitted a list of 160 applicants, most of them in pressing need of immediate assistance, and the pensions having been allotted to the ladies deemed most deserving of them, temporary grants of money were made to almost all the unsuccessful candidates. It has been deemed expedient this year, as a temporary measure, to reduce the amount of the pensions from £20, the sum usually received by the pensioners when first elected, to £10, in consequence of the present depression of the funds of the society.

Handsworth parish church is undoubtedly one of the most interesting places of its kind in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, for in it are deposited the bodies of the celebrated trio of Soho—Matthew Boulton, James Watt, and William Murdoch, the inventor of coal gas. The seated statue of Watt, one of the finest works of Chantrey, has a separate chapel to itself, built under the direction of the sculptor, who has been careful to arrange the light upon his work in a manner worthy the consideration of those who may desire to see interior sculpture shown to the best advantage. For many years the church was little better than a large barn, and patched with the Walpolian Gothic in vogue at the beginning of the present century. But four or five years ago the present Rector, the Rev. William Randall, made an appeal to the manufacturers of Birmingham and the inhabitants of his own parish for help to put the house in order again; for originally the church was a very handsome one, built about the middle of the fourteenth century. Sufficient money was raised to rebuild and extend the church in a manner worthy of its associations, but the amount ran short of the sum desired, and many proposed interior decorative works remained in abeyance. During the past few months this portion has been taken in hand, and the interior is now completed. The carvings and sculpture were entrusted to Mr. Roddis, of Birmingham; and Messrs. Burlison and Grylles, of London, have filled the west window with stained-glass.

THE UNIVERSITIES AND PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

The Ellerton theological prize at Oxford has been awarded to Mr. Charles Henley Walker, B.A., Oriel College; and the Lothian Historical Prize to Mr. W. J. Ashley, B.A., Balliol. Mr. H. C. B. Clayforth, Exhibitioner of Worcester College, born in the West Riding of the county of York, has been elected to the vacant scholarship on the foundation of the late J. Abbott, Esq., of Halifax. The examination was in classics, and is of the value of £60 for three years.

This year's Rede Lecture at Cambridge will be delivered by Mr. Matthew Arnold in the Senate House on June 14, the subject being "Literature and Science." Mr. J. P. Whitney, B.A., King's College, has been elected to Dr. Lightfoot's scholarship, founded for the encouragement of the study of ecclesiastical history. The Sheepshanks Astronomical Exhibition (of the annual value of about £50, and tenable for three years) has been awarded to Herbert Hall Turner, scholar of Trinity.

Wednesday, the 10th inst., was Presentation Day at the University of London. In the absence of the Chancellor, Lord Granville, the diplomas and other awards were presented by the Vice-Chancellor, Sir George Jessel, Master of the Rolls. Lord Sherbrooke, Lord Arthur Russell, and Sir John Lubbock, M.P. for the University, were among those who supported the Vice-Chancellor, and most of the members of the Senate were present. For the first time in the history of the University the lady graduates made their appearance in academical costume, and several ladies were among the recipients of diplomas. The Registrar, Mr. Milman, having read a report of the examinations held during the year, the undergraduates who had obtained exhibitions, medals, and prizes came forward and received their distinctions. The graduates who had passed during the year in the various faculties were then presented with their diplomas; those who had won scholarships, medals, and prizes receiving these distinctions separately.

Professor Lankester has been reappointed Professor of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy at University College, London; and Mr. Frederick Pollock and Mr. T. P. Taswell-Langmead have been appointed, respectively, Professors of Jurisprudence and of Constitutional Law and History.

The governors of St. Paul's School have made alterations in the annual award of school exhibitions. The sum distributed yearly has been increased from £1000 to £1400. For the future there will be given one classical exhibition of £80, a second of £60, and a third of £40; a mathematical exhibition of £70, and a second of £50; also a science exhibition of £50. These exhibitions are all tenable for four years.

The Right Rev. Dr. Patterson, Bishop of Emmaus, will be translated to the Roman Catholic see of Hexham and Newcastle, vacant by the death of the Right Rev. Dr. Chadwick.

DOWN IN A SWALLOW-HOLE.

In this pleasant spring-time, the swallows are skimming both land and water, flying rapidly hither and thither, twisting and turning upon the May-flies with lightning rapidity, their glossy plumage of black and brown and white gleaming in the sun, as they wheel "more fleet than bowyer's shaft." Sir Humphry Davy, in his "Salmonia," ranks the swallow as a sacred bird, together with the stork and ibis; and says that "he belongs to the Oracles of Nature." And, of what he further says thereupon, I thought, only on Sunday last, when a pair of swallows claimed sanctuary in our little village church, flying in through the old Norman doorway, as the clerk opened the door at ten o'clock, and refusing to quit the sacred building until just before the afternoon service. Now, although, in such circumstances, a certain beautiful text about a swallow finding a house instinctively recurs to one's thoughts, and though we recollect the Tate-and-Brady verse as to those birds being allowed "space to sit and sing," yet, we may remember that we are not now living in an Eastern country; and we know, practically, that the Rural Dean would call us to account if we permitted such things; and that we ourselves should be disposed to say something unpleasant to the highly respectable dame whose office it is to clean the church on a week-day. But there were the swallows—vainly, as I suppose, searching for flies in nave and chancel, wheeling around, and, occasionally, finding "space to sit and sing." Of course, such winged choristers altogether upset the school-children, whose eyes followed the rapid movements of the visitors; and, as for the rest of the congregation, how could the Rector expect to gain their undivided attention, when even so able a preacher as Sydney Smith could say, "A sparrow fluttering about a church is an antagonist which the most profound theologian in Europe is wholly unable to overcome."

Between swallows and Swallow-holes it would be easier to find a connection than between Macedon and Monmouth, for here are swallows skimming the shelving grass banks that rise far above me as I stand down at the bottom of this water-pierced hollow—or "Swallow-hole," as we locally term it—and look up through a fringe of trees to the blue sky and white clouds overhead. In our immediate neighbourhood there is a great variety in the landscape, owing to the frequent alternation of hard and soft beds of rock. The clay on which we stand rests on the great Oolite Limestone; and, out of the dark earth, fossil oysters are frequently turned up by the plough. In many places the constant action of water has worn away the limestone into fissures and caverns, which have subterranean chambers, through which the stream disappears. These spots are marked by hollows, of more or less dimensions, where, from the giving way of the limestone rock, the soil has sunk into a central basin, into which the stream from above falls, percolates, and is finally lost to view. They are so many grassy amphitheatres, sometimes on the slope of a hill, sometimes on a level, and in the heart of a wood. Because they swallow the water they are known as Swallow-holes, though some of our rustics term them "blowing-holes," from the noise that the wind frequently makes as it blows through the rocky caverns.

These, then, are our Swallow-holes; and we might be in many less pleasant spots or picturesque positions during the merry month of May than down in a Swallow-hole. Here are the swallows themselves, which have "come back again," as they did to the Queen o' the May; and around us are many wild flowers, the colour of which is yellow—a word which the delicate-eared Tennyson once made to rhyme with swallow. You will, I daresay, remember the passage; it occurs in those most melodious lines in "The Dying Swan." But in the vicinity of his Lincolnshire birthplace and home people of good birth and education pronounce "yellow" as though it were spelt "yallow;" and therefore, in describing a Fen scene, Tennyson naturally uses a Fen rhyme. In the "Lotus-Eaters," where he had not Lincolnshire in view, he rhymes yellow in the accustomed manner.

Talking of swallows and yellow flowers, I wonder if I shall find anywhere around this Swallow-hole the small dullish yellow blooms of the celandine—Wordsworth's flower? Yes, it grows near the old stonework, at the head of the Swallow-hole, where a drain has been made to carry off the water from the upland. Now, this celandine—which our forefathers called tetterwort, and believed to be a cure for that malady—is the herb Chelidonium, which is the Greek for swallow; and it was so called, and was further named swallow-wort, because it was believed that, with its acrid juices, the swallow opened the eyes of its young; and that, even if you wilfully blinded the young birds, this juice would still avail to restore their sight. Folk-lore goes even a step further with regard to swallows and eyes; for it is believed by country people that this celandine, or swallow-wort, may be applied to complaints of the human eye, and that a most excellent specific for all distempers of the eye is the flesh of a swallow when burnt to a cinder, and the ashes placed on the affected part. From the wild way in which the swallows are skimming over this cavernous Swallow-hole, one might be disposed to think that they were searching for a favourable spot whither they might go when they leave us after their six months' sojourn; for it has been believed that swallows disappear, both under the earth and under the water, where they huddle together, and with claws and beaks are fixed, as it were, into a ball, when, if taken up and duly warmed, they will unroll themselves and return to life. As yet, however, there are too many May-flies astir; and the swallows have not been long with us.

The Swallow-hole, at the bottom of which I am now standing, makes a great hollow in the steep slope of a grass field that is close to an extensive wood. It is a wood of hour antiquity, for it is mentioned in Domesday, and was part of the Conqueror's gift to a near relative. On the fields that slope down from it to the valley are many aged oaks and hawthorns, evidently the remains of the ancient forest, a portion of which has been cleared for pasture. This Swallow-hole is about two hundred yards in circumference; its upper end has been utilised to receive the drainage from the boggy land; and there are two or three masses of stonework, in which are large spouts, from the mouths of which the water trickles. It falls into a stream that has worn a tortuous channel down the sharp slope of the cavity. Two fine trees overshadow its upper part, an ash and an oak. The ash is very late in leaf this year; its boughs still look wintry, and the green is only just bursting from the shining black buds. One of its large roots is scooped out, like a basin, by the action of the water that pours into it from above, and, overflowing, falls into a lower basin. A dozen yards lower down is a fine old antlered oak, covered with its bright, tender foliage of golden green. Its gnarled roots are anchored in the sloping bank, and some of them are stretched across the bed of the little stream, and help to break it up into mimic waterfalls, as it plashes down from stair to stair, and is lost in a thicket of hawthorns. Their snowy May-bloom is in contrast to the golden glories of the gorse-bushes on the slope of the bank, every bright blossom defended by its sharp shiny swords of green. Beneath the hawthorn thicket, the stream reappears glistening in the sun, and falls lower down between tufts of rank herbage, until it takes a final leap into a well-hole. It is a dangerous place for sheep or cattle; for the rushes and weeds so cover the margin, that the hole is nearly concealed from view. Peering down, I see that this upright pit, some eight feet deep, leads to a stony cavern, where I note deep red stains on the rocks; and the stream passing over them, disappears to a still lower depth, and is lost to view. Such is the Swallow-hole, and now, as I climb the banks of its little amphitheatre, I find the grass studded with daisies, cowslips, late primroses, buttercups, blue speedwells, snowy stitchwort, and purple and light-pink orchis. A hare suddenly arises in an erect, listening posture; and then showing its scout, scampers away at full-speed.

In the next field is another Swallow-hole, covering a far larger area, and surrounded by many trees, among which I count seven oaks, eight ashes, three maples, and more than fifty old thorns. Standing down here below, and looking up through the slender avenue of hawthorns, between which the stream comes tripping and plunging, I see the interlacing boughs, the tracery of the shadows, and the intermingling of foliage and blossom. The air is heavy with the scent of the hawthorn—too heavy for me; for it is a sickly smell—or, as our rustics phrase it, it is "the smell of the Great Plague of London;" though I wonder how that tradition has been handed down to them, for we live a hundred miles from the Metropolis. But this smell of death is commonly associated with the hawthorn in the rural mind, and they will not take May-flowers into a sleeping room, lest the person therein slumbering should never awake, or only awake to some great misfortune. They have a proverb:—"If you sweep the house with the blossom'd broom of May, you'll be sure to sweep the head of the house away."

Let me get away from the sickly smell, though it is difficult to do so, where the old thorns are so profuse. Here is another Swallow-hole, much more rocky than the two we have just seen. It also lies in a depression on the hillside, with only one tree above it, a graceful birch, from beneath the roots of which the stream juts forth, and falls and splashes over great blocks of limestone, leaving many a brownish-red stain. There is a deposit of peroxide of iron; and, very probably, the water would be found—as said Sam Weller—to have "a very strong flavour o' warm flat irons"; which, as Mr. John Smucker contemptuously observed, "is the killibeat." The water has channelled its bed on the limestone rock, and you can safely descend some distance into the cavern, and see the stream falling and leaping from lower to lower cavern, until it is lost in darkness. Whither does it go? and where does it reappear? That is more than I can say; though the rustics tell me that pieces of marked wood, and other things, have been thrown in here and have reappeared floating out of a rock that is quite five miles distant. I am not able to say whether this is fact or fiction, or whether the experiment has been really tested. But I do know that this is not the only Swallow-hole that has harboured a fox. It was at this very spot, however, after a certain notable run, that Reynard, being hard pressed, suddenly jumped down into this cavern, and was quickly lost to view. The huntsman and whips had great difficulty in preventing the hounds from following him; and the proprietor of the clever little terrier, who usually attended the meets, declined to risk his favourite by turning him into those yawning caverns on the chance of bolting the fox. Perhaps he thought that the fate of his little dog would have been similar to that which befell the dog of Macdonald's piper, who boldly followed his master into a cave at Kiel, on the Mull of Cantire. But the piper was never seen again, though the skirl of his pipes was heard, and his voice crying "I doubt, I doubt, I'll ne'er win out!" But the little dog made his appearance out of another cave, six miles away, at Kilellan, and he was without his skin; and although his skin, in due time, came again, yet he was never heard to bark. I dare say that the fox in this swallow-hole did not penetrate very far, and came to earth again when all was quiet.

Two miles further away from here is another extensive wood, wherein are numerous Swallow-holes; and, as the wood is on a dead-level, these depressions in the surface are even more marked than those on the hillside. Here is one, evidently very deep, but so thickly overgrown with bushes and overhung by trees, that I cannot see down into it; though, far below me, I can hear the trickle of the water, as it falls from point to point, before its final disappearance. What a spot this would be for the concealment of a dead body! say, in an attack between gamekeepers and poachers; or in a murderous struggle between two poachers who had quarrelled over the division of their booty. I present the suggestion to sensational novelists, and pass on to a portion of the wood that was cleared of its dense undergrowth three years ago. Consequently, the oaks and other trees stand on a thick carpet of flowers of various colours, bravely lighted by the sun. The primroses still linger, though they are getting to look rather pale and washed-out; and here, too, is the cinque-spotted cowslip, whose fragrance, according to Shakespeare, lies in its "freckles"—the blue speedwell—the pretty wood-sorrel, with its delicate white blossom—the wild strawberry, with its small snowy roses—the blue violet that stays with us so much longer than its purple scented sister—the purple orchis, standing up gloriously in the sun, the "long purples" of poor Ophelia's garland, and to which our country children give the curious name "King's fingers"—the blueish purple of the common bugle, blossoming profusely in masses, so as to make large patches of colour—the delicate "silver-white" blossoms (as Shakespeare calls them) of the cuckoo flower, the lady's smock, though the children here (who seem to have special names for the wild flowers) call it "Lucy Locket"—the tender wood-anemones, still lingering—but, above all, the hyacinths. They are now in full bloom, in "sheets" which seemed the heavens uplifted through the earth," as Tennyson says, and, though so frequently called "blue-bells," are totally distinct from the frail harebells. You may be sure that Shakespeare, Scott, Burns, and Tennyson never made such an error as to call the hyacinth a blue-bell. The handsome Hyacinthus, son of Ameylas, the Spartan King, was supposed to be turned into this lovely flower when he was accidentally shot by Apollo; but the "hyacinthine locks" of Milton and Homer refer, not to the dark colour of the hair, but to the curls, like the reflex leaves of the blossom.

Passing on through these beds of hyacinths, the odour of which is pleasantly perceptible, the sunlight, streaming through the trees, falls upon a dense blue bank of them, looking all the more beautiful from growing upon a slope. It is the slope of a Swallow-hole. Around it, among the trees, are nut-bushes, hazels, blackberries, white-leaved palms, and lovely green trails of honeysuckles and briar-roses, that, in another month, will be hung with blossoms. There are groups of large dock-leaves, a study for the painter—cow-parsnip, almost as artistic; and various grasses, tall and flowery, with that pretty variety that we call quaker, or totter, grass. There have been hemlocks, six to eight feet high; and their white, withered stems, with their candelabra-like umbels, stand straight up against the green and blue and varied masses of colour; while, above them, is a crab-tree, covered with blossoms of white and pink and crimson. I scramble down the side of the Swallow-hole, the dead hemlocks crackling under my feet, and almost tread on a henpheasant, which rises quickly and sails straight away through the trees. Several gorgeous cock-pheasants have already been startled at my approach, and have flown away with their harsh cry, "Cock! cock!" in curious contrast with the delicious trills of the nightingales, who are singing "in full-throated ease" in all parts of the wood. I think of Mr. Briggs and his cock-pheasant that went off like a skyrocket and fireworks; and this hen, with her sudden springing from my feet, has startled me. But I know that her nest is near; and, there it is! though I should have passed it by; for, it is difficult to be seen, being as formless as that of the nightingale,—a mere scramble of dead leaves on which she has sat and laid her eggs. There they are—half a dozen of them—of pale olive brown, and scarcely to be distinguished from the withered leaves on which they lie.

What with the nightingales in full song, and the hyacinths in full bloom, there may be many less pleasant places to be in, on a sunny afternoon in May, than down in a Swallow-hole.

CUTHBERT BEDS.

THE HORSE SHOW.

Our Illustration of the Arab horses, with lady riders, in the Ring at one of the Horse Shows that have from time to time been held, in the Agricultural Hall at Islington, will find admirers, we trust, among the fair lovers of that noble animal and amateurs of the equestrian art. It is pleasant to see a good horsewoman mounted on a steed worthy of the charge he bears; and we remember how the authoress of "Our Home in Cyprus," Mrs. Scott-Stevenson, dwells upon the merits of "Bird-catcher," a thoroughbred white Arab that she brought from Malta, "very high-spirited, though gentle as a lamb. I rode," she says, "through every village and over every mountain on his back; and I need not say it nearly broke my heart when he came to an untimely end." In ascending Mount Olympus, the horse fell into a crevasse, with the lady beneath him, and was dragged out by her husband, Captain Scott-Stevenson. Mrs. Scott-Stevenson happily escaped with bruises and a sprained ankle, but had to finish her journey on a mule. We might also quote Miss Isabella Bird's agreeable narratives of her long rides in Japan, in the Rocky Mountain region of America, and in the Sandwich Islands; but she could scarcely have procured a thoroughbred horse of the Arab race. As a mere exercise in the Park, easy and skilful horsemanship is an elegant feminine accomplishment, which is practised by the ladies of England as successfully as by any of their sex in Europe.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Wedding March, composed for the marriage of H.R.H. the Duke of Albany and H.R.H. Princess Helen of Waldeck, by Charles Gounod (Novello, Ewer, and Co.). We have here an edition of the piece composed for the recent Royal Wedding, in its original form, for organ and three trombones. The march is a pleasing composition, in a graceful and melodious style; the closing portion introducing the air of the National Anthem, in chorale form, with altered rhythm, for the three trombones in unison, the organ being employed in a more florid under-current of harmony.

"Sarabande," minuet, and "Wedding Carol," for female (or boys') voices, from the incidental music to "Romeo and Juliet," composed by Sir J. Benedict. Messrs. Metzler and Co., have just issued these pleasing pieces, which have been recently interspersed in Shakespeare's love-tragedy. The carol is very flowing and melodious, mostly in two-part harmony, and the two dance pieces have much of the true antique and quaint grace.

Fantaisie Marziale, Morceau de Salon, by Lillie Albrecht (Duncan Davison and Co.), is a brilliant pianoforte piece, by the accomplished lady pianist, who knows how to write effectively for, as well as to play well on, the instrument. The principal theme is spirited, and is well contrasted by an episode (or trio) of a more cantabile character.

We can cordially recommend some recent publications of Messrs. Novello, Ewer, and Co. An "Andante," for the pianoforte (from Sonata No. 1), composed by E. A. Sydenham, is pleasing, and not difficult. A spirited march, entitled "Albany," by Gabriel Davis, will give satisfaction; while the vocal contributions, from the same house, come up to their usual standard; the most interesting being a sacred song, "Come unto me all ye that labour," by L. Horsley; "My Lady" (by the same composer), and "Only One," by W. H. S.

From the firm of Metzler and Co. we have some pleasing songs. "The Little Crossing Sweeper," by A. Carnall, is full of simple pathos. "In the Moonlight," by Lady Arthur Hill; "Shaking Grass," by A. M. Wakefield; "After Years," by A. C. Macleod; "For Aye," by O. Barri; "When all the World is Young," by J. M. Coward; and "In the Woods" and "April Song," by Georges Bizet, will be sure to find admirers. Among several agreeable instrumental pieces we may mention an effective arrangement, by B. Tours, for violin and piano, of "Yellow Jasmine," from "The Language of the Flowers," by F. H. Cowen, and "Chant des Matelots," caprice de concert, for the piano, by A. L'Estrange.

Of "Six Songs," by F. H. Cowen, all of a refined and tender character, we prefer the one called "Alas!" They are published by Mr. Joseph Williams; as are also "The Captain's Daughter," "More than all," and "May Moon," by Florian Pascal—easy and pleasing compositions.

Messrs. Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co. publish a transcription for the organ, by E. Cutler, of R. Schumann's Andante with variations for two pianos; also a Gavotte for the pianoforte by E. Cutler—both welcome contributions.

Messrs. Weekes and Co. send us four select pieces, arranged for the organ by J. C. Bridge, from compositions by Handel, Cramer, and Schumann; these will be found useful to organists. "La Blondine," valse; "La Brunette," mazurka; and a gavotte in G, are graceful contributions to the list of pianoforte pieces by B. Tours. From the same facile pen we have a piquant song, called "The Trysting Well." The following songs, from the same publishers, also deserve favourable mention:—"True as Gold," by A. J. Caldicott; "New Love, New Life," by D. Hume; "Dearest," by G. Belcher; and "The Lord is gracious," sacred song, by H. W. Little.

Some songs lately published by Messrs. Lamborn Cock and Co. deserve commendation. They are, "Ten Years Ago" and "Time passes on," by W. Maynard; "For Thee," by C. E. Tinney; "I love but one fair face," by J. Hullah; and "I praised the earth in beauty seen," a sacred song, by J. Greenhill. Among some graceful pianoforte pieces from this firm may be mentioned "Chant du Pêcheur," by F. Berger.

Some pretty songs, from the house of Enoch and Sons, are before us—viz., "Ages Ago," by F. H. Cowen; "Weaving" and "Dreaming," by M. Wellings; "Day by Day" and "The Kingdom Blest," by Cotsford Dick.

"Songs for Little Singers," by H. K. Lewis (by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton), will be a welcome and attractive addition to the juvenile repertoire, the words being cheerful and healthy in tone and the melodies simple and rhythmical.

CURIAL HALL: THE ARABS IN THE RING.

ROYAL INSTITUTION LECTURES.

DIGESTION.

Professor Arthur Gamgee, M.D., F.R.S., gave the first of four lectures on Tuesday, the 16th inst. He began by considering the essential requirements of the food of animals, referring to the light which had been thrown upon the subject by the doctrine of the conservation of energy. He then passed rapidly under review the various groups of organic food-stuffs (proteids, fats and oils, and starches and sugars), and showed how directly or indirectly animals derive all these from the vegetable kingdom, which is the storehouse both of the matter and the energy which they require. Having defined digestion as the assemblage of processes whereby the constituents of food are rendered soluble, and are converted into bodies, which are capable of being absorbed, the lecturer proceeded to discuss the general plan of the organs engaged in secreting the digestive juices—the saliva, the gastric juice, and the pancreatic juice. He next sketched historically the growth of our knowledge of the arrangements of the secreting apparatus, particularly drawing attention to the researches of Johannes Müller and John Goodsir. In the concluding part of the lecture attention was directed to the essential nature of ferments, and to the characteristics of ferment action, a distinction being drawn between organised ferments, such as the yeast plant, and unorganised or soluble ferments, such as the inverting ferment secreted by the yeast-cell, and which possesses the power of decomposing (inverting) cane-sugar into dextrine and levulose. The latter ferment is the type of the ferment found in the alimentary juices. The Professor's remarks were illustrated by experiments.

THE ALKALINE METALS, &c.

Professor Dewar, M.A., F.R.S., began his fifth lecture on Thursday, the 18th inst., by showing how sodium is dissolved in the gas ammonia under pressure, and how it returns to the metallic state when the pressure is removed. He then exhibited the remarkable variations in the spectra of the alkaline metals, the complexity changing with the temperature, termed "harmonic variation." Remarks were then made on the hypothetical metal ammonium, only found in combination with mercury, and termed an amalgam, although it differs from such in being compressible, and in otherwise behaving like a gas. Reference was then made to various specimens of the salts and other compounds of calcium, strontium, and barium, the crude materials from which those metals are obtained. The peculiar properties of these metals having been illustrated, an account was given of the processes of the great alkali manufacture. The old Leblanc system, according to which carbonate of soda and other salts are produced from common salt, by a series of changes, was first described. This was followed by the newer "direct" process, which dispenses with expensive plant and avoids much injurious waste. By this mode crystals were produced in the lecture-room. As this method is costly, through the expense of the ammonia, an essential agent, attempts have been made to revive the Leblanc process, by obtaining from the waste sulphide of lime materials required for the alkali manufacture. Experimental illustrations were then given of the properties of various compounds of calcium or lime; and the use of the solution of soap as a delicate test for the amount of carbonate of lime in water was illustrated.

MAKING AND WORKING OF A CHANNEL TUNNEL.

Sir Frederick Bramwell, F.R.S., gave the discourse at the evening meeting on Friday, the 19th inst. After some introductory remarks on the difficulties connected with the construction of tunnels in general, he commented on the absence of some of them in respect to the proposed channel tunnel between England and France, such as the short distance, good stratification (the grey chalk being easily worked, stable, and practically watertight). He explained how the cutting might be readily effected by machinery receiving its motive-power from above, and how the excavated matter might be conveniently removed by a succession of trains worked by compressed air, and thence raised by winding engines. He expressed his opinion that a good cylindrical tunnel would not require the erection of heavy timbering for the temporary lining. Construction with firm concrete blocks would be sufficient. In some remarks on the excavation, ventilation, and economy of the St. Gothard tunnel, he said that the position of the Channel tunnel was highly superior. Sir Frederick next proceeded to consider the various modes available for working railways in a tunnel; and commented successively on the ordinary locomotive (objectionable principally on account of ventilation), the fireless locomotive, and Siemens' improved one of the same kind, ropes, the pneumatic system, electricity, and, finally, compressed air—which last, having been tested by experience, he said, commended itself to his judgment as the best adapted for the purpose. In conclusion, he described in detail an efficient arrangement for the prevention of smuggling, and for the summary capture of a hardy gang of smugglers, even if they succeeded in filling a whole train.

DEFINITIONS OF POETRY.

Professor David Masson, of Edinburgh, gave the first of a course of four lectures on Poetry and its Literary Forms on Saturday last, the 20th inst. He began by commenting on some of the many definitions—including that of Wordsworth (who says, "Poetry is the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings; it takes its origin from emotion recollected in tranquillity"), Shelley, Matthew Arnold, and John Stuart Mill, who expounded Wordsworth's definition with much scientific precision. Professor Masson did not consider any of these adequate to express the theory of poetry; and resorted to Aristotle and Bacon, who both wrote discourses on poetry. The former makes poetry one of the imitative arts, and descends on its superiority over the others in dealing with articulate speech regulated by rhythm and metre—an art perfected by study and development. Bacon, on the contrary, dividing the faculties of man into memory, reason, and imagination, allots history to the first science and philosophy to the second, and poetry to the last. Poetry he compares to feigned history, of which he maintains the great use is satisfying the demands of the human mind more fully than real history, which is less agreeable in regard to morality and other points. He makes poetry to be creation or imagination. The very word poet, which signifies "maker," is as old as the art; and poets were called "makers" in Britain in the Middle Ages. Professor Masson suggested a compromise between Aristotle and Bacon; and summed up in Shakespeare's immortal definition:—

The poet's eye, in a fine phrensy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.

Professor Masson then defined the imagination to be a mode of thinking which consists in turning that which is impalpable into visibility, and in translating mere feelings into shapes, visions, or phantasms. After commenting on the diverse resources of the memory as material for cogitation, the mental stock of each person, on which he can work, the lecturer concluded with remarks on the unwritten poetry of dreams.

BENEVOLENCE AND SELF-HELP.

At the centenary festival of the Clare Market Public Dispensary, last week, £400 was contributed in aid of the funds.

A concert in favour of the Printers' Pension, Almshouses, and Orphan Asylum Corporation was given last Saturday night at St. James's Hall.

The biennial festival of the Finsbury Dispensary was held yesterday week at the Albion, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The subscriptions reached £700.

A dinner in aid of the funds of King's College Hospital was held in the hall of the Inner Temple yesterday week, Mr. O. Coope, M.P., in the chair; the subscriptions being £3423.

The annual dinner in aid of the funds of the National Hospital for Diseases of the Heart and Paralysis, Soho-square, will take place at Willis's Rooms on Friday, June 16, the Duke of Cambridge in the chair, supported by the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs. The list of stewards is a most influential one, embracing the names of many well-known philanthropists.

The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress will hold a Rose Show on June 29, at the Mansion House, in aid of the proposed Scarlet Fever Convalescent Home, and of the Royal Hospital for Women and Children, Waterloo-bridge-road. The exhibition will consist of 10,000 roses, from the gardens of the principal growers. There will also be an exhibition by amateur growers.

The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol presided yesterday week at a drawing-room meeting held at 37, Wimpole-street, by permission of Mrs. Jeune, in aid of the work of providing high-class musical entertainments for the industrial population. The report of the committee stated that concerts held in the Foresters' Hall, Clerkenwell, had been largely attended. Resolutions in favour of the work and promising support were unanimously adopted.

Mr. Mundella, M.P. presided at the annual meeting of the Church Schoolmasters and Schoolmistresses' Benevolent Institution, which was held last Saturday. The right hon. gentleman expressed his gratification that the National Society's teachers were doing so much to help themselves, and he was glad to know that now, not only was education more appreciated, but teachers were better remunerated than was the case some years ago.

A sermon was preached on Sunday morning at St. Peter's, South Kensington, by the Hon. and Rev. Francis Byng, the Vicar, in aid of the funds for maintaining the New Extension Building of the Brompton Consumption Hospital, which will accommodate 137 additional beds, and will be opened next month. There was a collection of more than £100.—The Earl of Derby, President of the Corporation, took the chair at the annual court of governors on Thursday.

The twenty-eighth anniversary festival of the Royal Hospital for Incurables was held at the Albion Hotel on the 18th inst. The hospital is situated at West-hill, Putney-heath. There are now 180 inmates, and there is room for eighty more. Besides these, there is a large number of out-patients, and these, within a certain radius of London, are constantly visited and full inquiry made into their condition to prevent imposture. Donations and subscriptions were announced to upwards of £3250.

The thirty-sixth annual meeting of the General Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institution was held last week at Willis's Rooms, under the presidency of Mr. Thomas Hankey, M.P. The report of the committee gave a satisfactory and encouraging statement of the progress of the institution. Last year the committee gave in pensions and temporary relief more than £1200, and invested moneys which brought up the capital invested—including the asylum fund—to close upon £20,000, leaving over £195 in the hands of the treasurer.

With the warm weather come longings for the country and seaside. At least 700 little ones connected with the St. Giles's Christian Mission Sunday Schools are most anxiously anticipating their annual summer day's ramble amidst fresh air, green fields, and sweet-smelling flowers. Many of the poor children are sadly neglected, and are crowded together, all the year round, amidst the pestilential atmosphere of the courts and alleys of Drury-lane and St. Giles's. It would be quite a calamity if they were debarred one day's enjoyment in the year outside our busy smoky city. Donations may be forwarded to Mr. Chapman, honorary superintendent, 1, Featherstone-buildings, Holborn; to Mr. Geo. Hatton (superintendent of the mission), 12, Ampton-place, Regent-square, W.C.; or to the bankers, Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, and Co., 54, Lombard-street.

The fifty-fifth anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum, which is situated in the Old Kent-road, the annual outlay of which is £8000, mainly raised by voluntary contributions, was held last week at the Crystal Palace. The chair was occupied by Mr. William Hoare, of the firm of Messrs. Hoare and Co., and the company numbered upwards of 1000. The chairman, in proposing the toast of "Prosperity to the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum," said that the institution, which was established in 1827, for the purpose of providing a comfortable home for distressed members of the trade and their wives and widows, had been attended throughout with signal success. It was, he said, the pride of the institution that it provided a pension for every one of its inmates; and he gave a detailed account of its doings and prosperous condition. On account of many substantial improvements which would have to be carried out during the coming year, the amount required would be larger than that for previous years. He earnestly entreated, therefore, all those present and the members of the trade generally to become subscribers. The secretary then read the list of subscriptions and donations received, which, including gifts of £100 and £500 from the chairman and Messrs. Hoare and Co. respectively, gave a grand total of £6500.

The annual meeting of the Society for Training Teachers of the Deaf on the German, or pure oral system, was held at the training college, Castlebar-hill, Ealing, on the 17th inst., General Cotton, C.S.I., in the chair. The report spoke of the rapid spread of the system of teaching the deaf by means of speech in foreign countries, in our colonies, and now in Great Britain itself. The success of the training college had necessitated removal to larger premises. These would require alteration, and must be purchased, for which purpose a special fund had been opened, and an urgent appeal was made to increase the amount. After the meeting the large general company, who had assembled in the beautiful grounds of the college to the number of 200 to 300, visited the school-room and witnessed the mode of teaching and the progress of the pupils.—On the same day the annual soirée of the South and East London districts, in connection with the Royal Association in Aid of the Deaf and Dumb, took place in St. Mary's School-room, St. Mary-street, Whitechapel, under the presidency of the Rev. Arthur J. Robinson, Rector of St. Mary's Whitechapel. After tea addresses were delivered, which were interpreted to the deaf and dumb. The evening's entertainment concluded with amusements. The Rev. Charles Rhind, Chaplain of the association, has charge of these two districts, in which there are upwards of 600 deaf and dumb persons.

NOVELS.

Injustice is very often done to a novel, or rather to its author, by treating it less as a work of art, to be studied and understood before it can be appreciated, than as a plaything to be cast aside with disgust, if it should fail to supply at the very first the amusement expected from it; and Traveller Hall: by Major-General W. G. Hamley (William Blackwood and Sons), is a novel likely to suffer from such injustice. Some time elapses before the story becomes interesting, but all the while the ground is being very carefully prepared, and certain characters, necessary for the development of the story, are being very cleverly and minutely delineated. Unfortunately, there is nothing very striking, attractive, or piquant about the characters, and there is nothing at all exciting about the incidents introduced for the purpose of illustrating them, so that the reader is in danger of growing weary and of relinquishing the task of perusal before the author's recondite studies of human nature have been properly apprehended and have begun, consequently, to produce their legitimate effect. Slow, in fact, is the epithet which would most fitly describe the greater part of the first volume, notwithstanding the skill with which the external and internal characteristics of many diverse personages are set forth; and it seems right, therefore, to warn impulsive readers not to be easily discouraged. The story has to do with the alienation and restoration of property; and property is always an interesting subject. Very early in the first volume there is a scene in which an invalid, a lady, explains to her two nearest relations—for the sake, of course, of informing the reader—how badly her husband's brother and family had behaved in bringing about her marriage for their own pecuniary advantage. She, therefore, as a Christian would, determines that none of that family shall benefit by her death, that she will leave her fortune to her husband should he survive her, for the remainder of his natural life, there being no animosity, but, on the contrary, the greatest affection between them personally, but that her possessions shall after his death go to her own representatives. Woman, however, proposes, and a higher power disposes; she is carried off before she can execute, or before she does execute, her purpose, confiding to her husband the duty of seeing that her intentions, contained in a packet of memoranda, are fulfilled, and he, being a passably honourable but totally weak gentleman, and having a brother who has no honourable scruples but great force of character, of course fails to perform his promise. So the property drops into hands that were never meant to touch it; and how it gets back, as it were, partly if not entirely, to its original possessors is the principal purpose of the tale to show. The date of the story is the reign of George the Third, which was rich in naval and military exploits; so that the love affairs, without which a romantic restoration of lost estates is not to be contemplated by a novelist, are diversified by an intermixture of warlike matters. And, when the author is a soldier, such an intermixture is peculiarly appropriate and has the best possible chance of being appropriately treated.

Lovers of what is horrible, terrible, extraordinary, and weird, described with singularly vivid power, will find in Prince Saroni's Wife, and Other Stories: by Julian Hawthorne (Chatto and Windus), a collection of short narratives eminently adapted to their taste and calculated to extort their admiration. In the majority of the tales murder is the fundamental theme; or, perhaps, love, passionate love, may be the fundamental theme, and murder is the outcome, the culmination. Pleasant reading the contents of the two volumes decidedly are not; thrilling and impressive, however, they may be, according to the reader's constitutional temperament. American and Italian colouring is conspicuous; and an Italian, a woman, is the principal figure in the most ingenious and not the least ghastly story of the whole number. There is but one bright, amusing tale, and that is the last; even that promises, almost to the very end, to conclude in a manner more dreadful and sanguinary than any other, and, though the fearful anticipation is unrealised, it produces a state of mind unfavourable for full enjoyment of the humour displayed in the portrait of the American advertising and negotiating agent and in several happily constructed situations. Upon one point a question arises relating to bad art. The author, for instance, writing in the first person, sometimes tells the reader what the personages depicted in the stories are doing, sometimes requires to be informed by those personages; this is clearly absurd. It was as open to the author to be present at the murder of Prince Saroni's wife as at the passionate love-passages between the Prince and the woman he loved. For it must be understood that in neither case is the author present with the cognisance of the fictitious personages, and his assumption of ignorance at one time and of knowledge, without any more reason, at another has a ludicrous effect.

Money, love, and marriage are usually the chief topics to be dealt with in novels; and The Freres: by Mrs. Alexander (Richard Bentley and Son), is no exception to the rule. It would be a pleasant change, perhaps, if a new and original line could be struck out; but in the meanwhile "The Freres" may be accepted as a good specimen of the old and still prevalent style. We have a very charming heroine, who is conducted through various trials to a most satisfactory state of life; and we have divers characters sketched with much skill, grace, and quiet humour, as well as sundry places, situations, and incidents described with freshness and vigour. Perhaps the first of the three volumes is a little tedious; for the well-born but impoverished family reduced to living in dingy lodgings is a somewhat hackneyed theme, and we are more than a little familiar with the dealings and language of the ordinary landlady, who, though human, and even humane, is somewhat jealous, testy, suspicious, and regardless of "the bill." Nor do we now for the first time make the acquaintance of the young scapegrace, the mother's darling, whose extravagance, weakness, and even criminal behaviour bring trouble upon his relatives; nor of the peerless sister who is a mother both to him and to the rest of her family, including the titular mother; nor of the devoted henchman, the ancient servitor and friend, who, being an Irishman, sacrifices himself in the most touching and, at the same time, the most amusing manner, for the sake of those whom he loves and respects, and to whom he considers himself bound by the ties of gratitude. When, however, the author takes us away to Saxony and introduces us to German society, the story becomes more interesting, the scenes are invested with the charm of novelty, and, although the style of writing is occasionally suggestive of a lesson, a very elementary lesson, in the German language, a piquant and agreeable study of persons and manners is presented, and the reader is carried easily and pleasantly along to a pretty comfortable conclusion. It is a little hard, however, that the pearl of heroines should be transported to Australia, and that her unselfish slave, the Irish henchman, should be left lamenting in the lonely, forsaken condition which is too often in this world the fate of the most affectionate and least selfish natures. It is not the heroine's fault, however; let that be clearly understood.

ADVANCED PHARMACY.

LACTOPEPTINE, AN ABSOLUTE CURE FOR DYSPEPSIA AND INDIGESTION.

NOT A SECRET REMEDY—FORMULA STATED ON EACH BOTTLE.

ITS GENUINENESS AND PURITY CERTIFIED BY THE HIGHEST CHEMICAL AND MEDICAL AUTHORITY.

The most serious outcome of modern social life is the prevalence of Dyspepsia and Indigestion. No one is altogether free from one or other of the manifold forms in which this scourge attacks the human body, and no dietetic rules can be framed which would insure deliverance from the insidious attacks of this foe. There is no age and no condition of life exempt from its assaults. Its tortures are as certain to get hold of us as that we live. The extended use and adoption of Lactopeptine by the Medical Profession affords indisputable evidence that its therapeutic value has been thoroughly established in cases of Indigestion, Dyspepsia, Loss of Appetite, Impoverished Blood, General Debility, Intestinal and Wasting Diseases of Children, Chronic Diarrhoea, Constipation, Headache, Nausea, and in every description of stomach ailment or disease, and even where all other known remedies have failed and proved ineffectual. One of the chief features of Lactopeptine (and the one which must gain it a preference over all digestive remedies) is, that it precisely represents in composition the natural digestive juices of the stomach, pancreas, and salivary glands, and will therefore readily dissolve all foods.

From "Retrospect of Practical Medicine and Surgery," July, 1877.

"A glance at the formula of Lactopeptine would convince even the most sceptical of the valuable results that must ensue through its administration."

From "The British Medical Journal."

"We have submitted the Lactopeptine to trial, and can confidently recommend it."

From "The London Medical Times and Gazette."

"Where we have had an opportunity of presenting it, its employment has been decidedly satisfactory."

From the "London Medical Press and Circular."

"Such a formula is a desideratum, considering that the preparations of Pepsin now in use have disappointed the expectations of many practitioners."

From the "Physician and Pharmacist."

"We have no hesitation in affirming that Lactopeptine has proved itself to be the most important addition ever made to our Pharmacopœia."

From the "Physician's Monitor."

"We have in this preparation, we believe, the only perfect dyspeptic remedy that can be produced, for it supplies those deficient natural elements that are required to perfectly digest food, and the digestive organs are soon restored to their normal condition."

Professor ATTFIELD, Ph.D., F.R.S., F.I.C., F.C.S.,

PROFESSOR OF PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY TO THE PHARMACEUTICAL SOCIETY OF GREAT BRITAIN, REPORTS AS FOLLOWS:—

"London, May 3, 1882.

"Lactopeptine having been prescribed for some of my friends, during the past five years—apparently with very satisfactory results—its formula, which is stated on the bottles, and its general characters, have become well known to me. But recently the Manufacturer of this article has asked me to witness its preparation on the large scale, to take samples of its ingredients from large bulks and examine them and also mix them myself, and to prepare Lactopeptine from ingredients made under my own direction; doing all this with the object of certifying that Lactopeptine is what its maker professes it to be, and that its ingredients are in quality the best that can be obtained. This I have done, and I now report that the almost inodorous and tasteless pulverulent substance termed Lactopeptine is a mixture of the three chief agents which enable ourselves and all animals to digest food—that is to say, Lactopeptine is a skilfully-prepared combination of MEAT-CONVERTING, FAT-CONVERTING, and STARCH-CONVERTING materials, acidified with those small proportions of the acids that are always present in the healthy stomach; all being disseminated in an appropriate vehicle—namely, powdered sugar of milk. The acids used at the factory—lactic and hydrochloric—are the best to be met with, and are perfectly combined to form a permanent preparation; the milk sugar is absolutely pure; the powder known as 'diastase' or starch-digesting (bread, potato, and pastry-digesting) material, as well as the 'pancreatin,' or fat-digesting ingredients, are as good as any I can prepare; while the pepsin is much superior to that ordinarily used in medicine. Indeed, as regards this chief ingredient—pepsin—I have only met with one European or American specimen equal to that made and used by the manufacturer of Lactopeptine. A perfectly parallel series of experiments showed that

Of the many complaints in which Lactopeptine has shown most prompt and decided success none have been more quickly relieved than the various forms of headache, including nervous and sick headache; and it is safe to say, that nine cases out of ten of this distressing complaint are due to inactive or sluggish liver, with constipated bowels. A few doses of Lactopeptine soon restore these organs to their proper functions, and the headache ceases. In the same manner they relieve all forms of biliousness, such as dizziness, nausea, drowsiness, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, pain in the side, sallow skin, &c. A dose taken immediately after eating causes the process of digestion to begin at once, prevents dyspepsia and indigestion, with sour rising of food from the stomach, and relieves the distress caused by too hearty eating.

Every person suffering from Indigestion, Dyspepsia, or any symptom of a "Stomach out of Order" should send for a Pamphlet respecting the positive cure by the use of Lactopeptine, and read the cases and letters from Medical Men in every part of the world, showing results in practice. More than 1000 Doctors, 10,000 Chemists, the entire Medical Press have certified as to the remarkable efficacy of Lactopeptine. It is rational in the theory of its action, and cures all disorders of the Digestive Organs.

Lactopeptine can be obtained of all Chemists, and may also be sent by post to any address on receipt of 4s. 6d. Each Bottle contains forty-eight 10-grain doses. It is agreeable to the taste, and may be taken in either wine or water, after meals.

Copy of Letter signed by leading Chemists and Druggists, throughout the country:—"The undersigned, Wholesale Druggists and Dealers in Medicines, have pleasure in stating that we have sold the Lactopeptine since its introduction, and find it to be an article of increasing sale and reputation."

any given weight of acidified pepsin alone at first acts somewhat more rapidly than Lactopeptine containing the same weight of the same pepsin. Sooner or later, however, the action of the Lactopeptine overtakes and outstrips that of pepsin alone—due, no doubt, to the meat-digesting, as well as fat-digesting, power of the pancreatin contained in the Lactopeptine. My conclusion is that Lactopeptine is a most valuable digesting agent, and superior to pepsin alone.

JOHN ATTFIELD."

Lactopeptine wholly supersedes the administration of purgatives—salts, cathartic or aerated waters. It reduces the labour required from the stomach; gives it, when weak, the necessary period for repose and recuperation; and enables it to carry out its natural operations without impairing any function. Lactopeptine never fails to bring about the digestion of food in a manner perfectly identical to that obtained under the influence of the natural gastric juices, and enable the process of digestion to be completed without straining the power of the stomach. It also restores the deranged and torpid liver to its normal condition and healthful action; removes and prevents Constipation by securing a natural and regular action of the bowels, and relieves those unpleasant symptoms which attend a diseased or morbid condition of the Liver, Stomach, and Bowels.

Lactopeptine is not purgative or relaxing in its effect. Many persons have a wrong idea of this medicine, and suppose it has not had its proper result unless a violent purge and action of the bowels immediately follow a dose. Medicines which violently purge, simply pass out of the system, usually leave the bowels constipated, seldom remove the cause of trouble, or improve the general health.

OPENING OF THE ST. GOTHARD RAILWAY: TUNNELS AND ZIGZAG NEAR MONTE PIOTINO.

The international festivities, Swiss, Italian, and German, to celebrate the completion of the great Alpine tunnel and opening of the railway through the St. Gothard, have occupied four days this week, beginning on Sunday with the arrival of the first train, at Lucerne, which had passed through the St. Gothard Tunnel, bringing the Italian guests. Among these were eight members of the Italian Cabinet, nine of the Senatorial Bureau, and fifteen of the Chamber of Deputies; the Italian visitors included Count Ticino, Chevalier Minghetti, General Menabrea, and Signor Cairoli. The second train, from the opposite direction, brought the German and Swiss guests. Among the former were Herren Bitter, Von Boetticher, Von Puttkammer, and other members of the German Federal Council; Dr. Lasker, Dr. Dellbrück, representatives of all the German State railways, and the three Presidents of the German Reichstag. Among the Swiss were Herr Bavier, the President of the Republic, and all the members of the Swiss Federal Council. In all, six hundred and fifty guests had been invited, being three hundred Italians, two hundred Swiss, and one hundred and fifty Germans. Great preparations had been made at Lucerne to honour the achievement of this grand engineering work. The quays, the bridge, the streets, and the approach to the station were profusely decorated with garlands and flags. The colours of the twenty-two Cantons of Switzerland predominated, but many Italian and German flags were displayed. The trains arrived at the station amidst the enthusiastic acclamations of the inhabitants, the roar of cannon which woke the echoes of the hills, and the playing of military bands. On Monday, there were excursions on the Lake of Lucerne, and to the summit of the Righi; the President of the Swiss Republic held an official reception; and the guests were entertained with a grand banquet at the Schweizerhof; there was also a brilliant display of fireworks. The construction of the St. Gothard Railway was begun eleven years ago. The principal tunnel under the Kastelhorn was pierced from Göschenen to Airolo by Feb. 29, 1880; but it has required more than two years to complete the minor works, so as to enable ordinary traffic to proceed without interruption from the Swiss to the Italian side of the mountains.

The original capital of the St. Gothard Railway Company was £4,000,000, Germany, Italy, and Switzerland each raising one third of the amount. It is understood that the actual cost of the works has exceeded the sum by at least one half. The primary surveys were made and the line of the tunnel laid out by M. Gelpke, and from time to time the enterprise has been under the control of MM. Gervig, Hellweg, and Bridel. The contract was taken in the spring of 1872 by M. Louis Favre, of Geneva, who died about three years ago. The principal work is a tunnel of nine miles and 468 yards, of a maximum width of 26 feet 3 inches, and a height to the crown of the arch of 19 feet 8 inches. At Göschenen the rails are, according to M. Ethelston's survey, 3638 feet above the sea, and at Airolo 3756 feet, or a difference of 118 feet between the Swiss and Italian ends of the tunnel, which runs nearly due north and south. The well-known Devil's Bridge, on the St. Gothard road, and the western boundary of the village of Andermatt, are almost exactly above it. The culminating point of the mountain range under which the tunnel is run is 9387 ft. above the sea. This point occurs at a distance of 4½ miles from the Göschenen end, and is 4600 ft. above the level of the rails. The gradient of the tunnel changes from an ascent to a descent at a distance of 437 yards to the north of the centre, the gradient on the Swiss side being at the rate of 1 in 171·82. Afterwards there is a fall at the rate of 1 in 2000 for about three eighths of the distance, and 1 in 500 for the remaining five eighths of the course from the central change to the Airolo end. The great tunnel is, however, only one of several, there being, in the twenty miles of which the line through the mountain chain consists, several smaller ones three or four miles long, as well as many galleries and bridge-like cuttings. Our illustrations this week are views of the viaduct over the Rohrbach, between Wasen and Göschenen, the bridge and tunnel at Wasen, and the tunnels and lines, on different ascending levels, near Monte Piotino.

VIEWS OF LEICESTER.

The ancient town of Leicester, which next Monday will be visited by the Prince and Princess of Wales, upon the occasion of opening the Abbey Park, newly created for the recreation of the people, is a place of some renown in the history of this country. There is a mythical tradition that it was once the abode of the British King Lear, or Leir, and his three daughters, whose story is preserved and exalted to the highest poetic interest by Shakespeare's immortal tragedy. What is far more certain is the opinion of topographical antiquaries that this place was the important Roman military station of Ratae, with a Roman town noticed by several writers for its stately mansions and temples, some remains of which have been discovered. A piece of old wall, commonly called the Jewry Wall, twenty-five yards in length and fifteen or eighteen feet high, with arched recesses, built of stone, but turned with a layer of flat bricks, is considered to be of Roman masonry; and there are some fragments of tessellated pavement. Leicester is near the Foss, one of the main roads which the Romans constructed through Britain; and a Roman milestone, bearing the name of the Emperor Trajan, with the notification that it was three miles to Ratae, has been removed from its position on that road to the Museum of the Leicester Archaeological Society. The name also of the Rhedagna, the Roman race-course for charioteers, is traceable in that of the Rawdykes, a place near the junction of the Burton railway with the main line of the Midland Company. It is said that Ratae contained a famous subterranean temple of the two-faced Janus, some remnants of which may possibly exist still underground. The town stands on the banks of the Soar, a small river which is commemorated, with its tributary stream, in the following lines of Drayton's "Polyolbion":—

Thus, with her handmaidence, the Soar doth easily slide
By Leicester, where yet her ruins show her pride, Demolished many years, that of the great foundation
Of her long-buried walls men hardly see the station;
Yet of some pieces found, so sure the cement locks
The stones, that they remain like perdurable rocks.

Under the Saxon Kings of Mercia, Leicester was the seat of a powerful Earldom, but was, in the wars between the Danes and Saxons, exposed to become the theatre of conflict; and its resistance, at a later period, to William the Norman, brought more carnage and havoc to the town. In 1173, it was almost destroyed, in consequence of the disaffection of the Earl of Leicester to the Plantagenet King; and its Castle, together with that of Groby, a few miles distant, was nearly razed to the ground. Leicester Castle was rebuilt, however, in the next century, by Simon de Montfort, the great Earl of Leicester, and was enlarged, at a later date, by the addition of the New Work or Newark as it is called, which is connected by a turret gateway with the courtyard surrounding the Mount, anciently the Castle Keep. This is entered from Oxford-street, by a gateway which is called the Magazine from the arms of the traitors having been usually kept in the gatehouse. There are remains in the Castle of a fine old hall, the roof of which was supported by two rows of oaken pillars with carved capitals, 30 ft. high. On the north side of the Newark is Trinity Hospital, an almshouse for one hundred "poor and weak men," erected by Henry of Lancaster in the fourteenth century, but the modern front of the building is of the Georgian era. In the chapel here is a monument to Mary de Bohun, the first wife of Henry IV. The oldest church in the town is that dedicated to St. Nicholas, which is partly constructed of bricks and stones taken from the Roman city wall; but the Church of St. Mary de Castro, with its Norman chancel and a porch and other features of that style, the later portions being from Early English to Perpendicular, has more architectural interest. St. Margaret's, chiefly of Perpendicular Gothic, with a lofty embattled tower, above 100 ft. high, occupies the site of the ancient Saxon Cathedral, which was removed to Dorchester (the small place of that name in Oxfordshire), and afterwards to Lincoln.

Leicester Abbey was founded in 1143 by Robert Le Bossu, the humpbacked Earl of Leicester, as a monastery of Black Canons; and was further endowed by his daughter-in-law, Petronilla, who gave a long plaited tress of her hair for a rope to suspend the lamp in the chapel. The Abbey grew rich, and was enabled to offer splendid entertainments to Kings and Princes travelling this way; but, in 1530, here came the ruined favourite of Henry VIII., Cardinal Wolsey, a helpless invalid, on his road from York to London; and here he died. It is always worth while to borrow a bit of Shakespeare:—

At last, with easy roads, he came to Leicester, Lodged in the Abbey; where the reverend Abbot,
With all his convent, honourably received him;
To whom he gave these words: "Oh, Father Abbot,
An old man, broken with the sorrows of state,
Is come to lay his weary bones among you;
Give him a little earth, for charity!"
So went to bed, when eagerly his sickness
Pursued him still; and three nights after this—
About the hour of eight, which he himself
Foretold should be his last—full of repentance,
Continual meditations, tears, and sorrows,
He gave his honours to the world again,
His blessed part to Heaven, and slept in peace.

All that is now left to be seen of the buildings of Leicester Abbey, on the bank of the Soar opposite to the Ashby-de-la-Zouch road, north of the town, is the gateway and some walls of the Abbey precinct; but this ground has now been converted into the new Abbey Park, of which we give some illustrations.

The Townhall of Leicester is a building of the Elizabethan period, which was opened, in 1583, with a grand banquet of special rejoicing for the defeat of the Spanish Armada. There is here a large room, or hall, in which the Corpus Christi Guild of Leicester used to hold its meetings, and which contains some historical portraits, among them one of the Earl of Huntingdon, painted in 1623. The Mayor's parlour is adorned with windows of stained glass as old as the time of Henry VII., and with curious old wood-carving. There were, not long ago, several houses of that old date in Leicester, one being the Blue Bear tavern, where Richard III. slept before the battle of Bosworth; he was, a day or two afterwards, brought back to this town a dead man for burial. Of the charitable institutions of Leicester, belonging to the olden time, the most conspicuous is Wyggeston's Hospital, founded in 1513, and rebuilt some years since. Leicester was besieged in 1645, during the Civil Wars, when it held out against Charles I. The modern town is fairly prosperous, by its stocking-weaving, shoe making, and other useful industries. It will be made very gay, next week, by the festivities attending the Royal visit, for which great preparations are in hand.

A meeting of the Irish Judges was held in Dublin on the 18th inst., to consider the provision in the bill now before Parliament to try prisoners by a Commission of three Judges without a jury. Several of the Judges expressed themselves in opposition to the suspension of trial by jury.

A ballot at the Reform Club took place on the 18th inst., when the resolution, moved by Lord Hartington and seconded by Mr. Bright, declaring it to be desirable that the election of members should be conducted by a committee instead of by a ballot, as heretofore, was rejected by 382 votes to 361.

MARRIAGE LORE OF THE MONTHS.

From time immemorial there has been a deep-rooted conviction in our own and other countries that certain seasons of the year are more propitious for entering on the state of matrimony than others. However fanciful this piece of superstition may appear, it has exerted a strong influence over all classes of society, and still retains its hold. Thus, for instance, a violent antipathy has always prevailed with regard to the month of May, which is generally considered the most unlucky season for marriage. This superstitious notion may be traced back eighteen centuries ago up to the time of Ovid, who speaks of the Roman objection to marriage in this month.

Nec viduae tuius eadem, nec virginis apta
Tempora. Quae nupsit non diuturna fuit.
Hac quoque de causâ, si te proverbium tangat,
Mene malas maio nubere vulgus ait.

The last line, it may be remembered, has an historic value as having been fixed upon the gates of Holyrood Palace on the morning of the marriage of Mary Queen of Scots to Bothwell (May 16). Hence numerous old adages have clustered round the month of May, all of which denounce its ominous character. According to a well-known proverb:—

Marry in May,
And you'll rue the day.

Or, as they say in the North of England:—

Marry in May,
Rue for aye.

And again, another saying informs us how:—

From the marriage in May all the bairns die and deesy.

We are further admonished by an old writer that:—

The girls are all stark naught that wed in May.

To add, also, an oft-quoted proverb:—

Who marries between the sickle and the scythe will never thrive.

The same superstition prevails in Scotland; and in Sir John Sinclair's "Statistical Account of Scotland" we are told how "that day of the week upon which the 14th of May happens to fall is esteemed unlucky through all the remainder of the year: none marry or begin any business upon it. None choose to marry in January or May, or to have their banns proclaimed in the end of one quarter of the year, and to marry in the beginning of the next." Sir Walter Scott was not exempt from this prejudice, for we read how he hurried away from London that his daughter Sophia's wedding might take place before this inauspicious month commenced. According to a Scotch proverb, still much credited:—

Married in May, and kirked in green,
Baith bride and bridegroom won't long be seen."

Mr. Jeaffreson, in his "Brides and Bridals" (1873, p. 292), refers the evil reputation of marriages solemnised in May to the Church's absolute rule forbidding weddings between Rogation and Whit Sunday. Of the numerous ill consequences formerly supposed to befall those who might marry in this month are the following:—"That women disobeying the rule would be childless; or, if they had children, that the first-born would be an idiot, or have some physical deformity; or that the married couple would not live happily together in their new life, but soon quarrel."

May marriages are considered unlucky, too, in France, and there is a common rhyme:—

Si le commun peuple dit vrai,
La mauvaise s'épouse en Mai.

June, on the other hand, has always been looked upon as a most fortunate month for marrying. When Ovid was anxious about the marriage of his daughter, we read how he

Resolved to match the girl, and tried to find
What days auspicious were, what moons were kind;
After June's sacred Ides his fancy strayed,
Good to the man and happy to the maid;

one reason, perhaps, for the popularity of this month being that it contains the summer solstice, and is a season of fruitfulness. It is a very popular month in Scotland, and in the year 1874, in the city of Glasgow, the marriages in the month of May were only 204, but as many as 703 in June; the average of the eleven months, excluding May, being 441. Passing on to other seasons connected with marriage, it appears in days gone the Church forbade marriages to be celebrated between the first Sunday in Advent and Hilary Day, between Septuagesima Sunday and Low Sunday, and Rogation Sunday and Trinity Sunday. Hence the following rhyme:—

Advent marriage doth deny,
But Hilary gives thee liberty;
Septuagesima says thee nay,
Eight days from Easter says you may;
Rogation bids thee to contain,
But Trinity sets thee free again.

In an old almanac for 1612 we find the following, illustrative of the above rule:—

Times prohibiting marriage it is year,
From the 27 November till January 13,
From February 6 until April 18,
From May 16 until June 6.

Although these restrictions were abolished at the Reformation, yet many continued to respect the prohibitions till the close of the seventeenth century, and even later.

"Childermas, or Holy Innocents' Day has been at all times a black day in the calendar," says Brand ("Pop. Antiq.," 1849, ii. 168), "of impatient lovers." On this account few marriages ever take place, being generally postponed until the ensuing day.

The Scottish people, as we learn from the reports of the Registrar-General, have a special fondness for marrying on the last day of the year. Indeed, it appears, there are more marriages in Scotland on that day than in any week of the year, excepting the week in which that day occurs. Thus, by way of illustration, in the year 1861, the returns give the number of marriages in the eight principal towns as averaging about twenty-five a day, exclusive of Sunday. On Dec. 31, however, in the same towns there were between 400 and 500 marriages.

With the ancient Greeks, January was a favourite season for marriage; the 4th being considered by Hesiod as a favourable day; but the 16th and 18th were generally avoided.

In an old almanac for the year 1655, certain days are pointed out as "good to marry or contract a wife (for then women will be fond and loving)—namely, Jan. 2, 4," &c.

Lent is still thought by many to be an unlucky season for matrimony, for we are told:—

Marry in Lent
And you'll live to repent.

That this superstition, however, is not countenanced by those in high places may be inferred from the fact that some of the present Royal Family have been married in Lent. It is considered unlucky, too, to marry on the feast of St. Joseph (March 19), and this day is therefore often avoided.

According to a piece of Russian folk-lore, Easter engagements are supposed to bring money; those at Ascension-tide, health; those at Whitsuntide, peace in the domestic circle, and those at Trinity, a numerous progeny. Lastly, many a bridal couple are not only particular as to the month they select for their wedding-day, but they take care that its evening shall have, if possible, a growing moon. Indeed, we are told that, in the Orkneys, if a bride can marry with a growing moon and flowing tide she considers herself a favourite of fortune.

NEW BOOKS.

Mrs. Oliphant is a little hard upon the critics considering the praise she has won from them. They may allow that she is perhaps too ambitious, too versatile, too prone to grasp at her own whole realm of literature; but there is not one of them who will deny that she is a charming writer, with considerable acquisitions, with fine poetical instincts, with generous and lofty aims. Here is another large and delightful work from her pen—The Literary History of England in the End of the Eighteenth and Beginning of the Nineteenth Century, three vols. (Macmillan and Co.). It would be curious to ask the cause of the pleasure we gain from its perusal? There is in it little that can be said to be new to a reader acquainted with the literature of the period. The pages abound with biographical incidents, and the lives of Cowper, Burns, Crabbe, Wordsworth, Southey, Shelley, and Scott, to mention a few prominent names among many, may be said to be written here in miniature. The author's criticisms, too, far from being perverse and eccentric, are for the most part such as we might expect from a woman of high culture and good taste. "How true and just this is," we exclaim, as the writer allures us on from page to page; so true and so just, indeed, that when, in rare instances, we meet with an opinion not generally accepted, it is with a feeling of surprise. And yet the book although very unequal has not a dull page, nor has it a remark which it would be fair to characterise as common-place. The strength of the volumes lies, we think, in the generous enthusiasm of the writer, in her exquisite appreciation of what is noble in literature and in life, in the felicity of expression which throws light and colour upon familiar themes. It would be unfair in a notice too brief to do this "Literary History" justice, to dwell upon its defects, but it may be observed that the title of the book raises expectations which it can be scarcely said to justify, unless, indeed, we accept Carlyle's dictum that biography is the only history. By far the larger part of Mrs. Oliphant's attention is centred on the poets who made the beginning of this century so famous, and on their immediate predecessors, Cowper and Burns. The former was the boldest of innovators in an age that had not escaped from the influence of Pope, and the latter in a way still more beautiful, found all his inspiration from nature and from love. Crabbe, too, was a genuine singer, though his poetry has been compared to a peach with the bloom rubbed off; and the author's account of the poet Scott loved so well gives a just estimate of a man whose writings for the present, at least, seem to be out of date. Wordsworth, "the immortal Lake-maid," the poet of wide atmospheres and silent skies," receives the fullest recognition; and we are all the more glad to read Mrs. Oliphant's glowing eulogy of the great Ode, since of late it has been somewhat disparaged by Mr. Matthew Arnold. Right glad, too, are we to see with what a vigorous hand she grapples with Carlyle's unappreciative estimate of Walter Scott, and also with what subtle insight she comments on the marvellous imagination of Coleridge. Truly does she observe that "the three poems on which his reputation rests are among the most perfect of the great productions of the age." We regret to say so little of a book any chapter of which would afford ample food for appreciative comment. The names that fill these volumes take us back to one of the richest and to the most familiar of literary epochs. How much our country owes to the great masters of English literature who flourished nearly a century ago, will be felt by those who are familiar with the narrower range of the so-called "Queen Anne Men" and the lesser lights that succeeded them. Wordsworth and Coleridge, Jane Austen and Scott, Shelley, Byron, and Keats, have opened up a new world, and we who live in it are apt to forget from whom we received the heritage. Mrs. Oliphant reminds us of our debt, and does this in a manner so attractive that the reader must be either dull or ungrateful who does not frankly acknowledge it.

A noble-looking book about a noble wine is A History of Champagne: by Henry Vizetelly (Henry Fotherman and Co.), with its covers of green and gold, the old "Imperial livery" of France, and with its profusion of illustrations. The engravings are no fewer than three hundred and fifty, it is stated, in number; some of them are of great interest, being derived from ancient sources, some of them are quaint, some of them are handsome, some of them are in excellent taste, very few are in questionable taste, and all are characteristic. To the history of champagne are added notes referring to other sparkling wines, such as Sammar; and it is probable that the large volume contains such an amount of information touching the subject of which it treats as cannot be found elsewhere. How competent the author was for the task he undertook is to be inferred from the functions he has discharged and from the exceptional opportunities he enjoyed: so that, though there may be an inclination to differ from him here and there, he who differs must feel considerable diffidence in doing so. Not many years ago the author published a little book entitled "Facts about Champagne and other Sparkling Wines," and those "facts" he has included in this more comprehensive work, but he has reviewed, revised, and extended them, adding to them and clustering about them a vast quantity of instructive, illustrative, entertaining, and ornamental literary matter, both verse and prose. The whole forms an exceedingly handsome and desirable volume.

Whoever will read By the Sea of Galilee, by M. S. Mac Ritchie (Wells Gardner, Darton, and Co.), with illustrations by H. I. A. Miles, will be fain to acknowledge that it is a very pretty, touching, musical outburst of tender and pious feeling, in a very pretty and prettily illustrated little volume. It is nothing more, perhaps, but it is certainly nothing less; and the very prettiness is of the simple, unpretentious kind. The little poem is a fanciful version of the story told about the woman who touched the hem of the Saviour's robe and was discovered even in the throng that pressed about him; the treatment of the theme is quite modern, and it is doubtful whether the pathos is not diminished rather than enhanced by the conclusion. At any rate, it would have been more poetical, and less commonplace, to have made the heavenly influence, which was transmitted through the touch, sufficient in itself for complete happiness without the addition of, however pure, an earthly love.

About 200 members of Parliament and other leading supporters of the United Kingdom Alliance were present at a breakfast on the 18th inst., under the presidency of Sir Wilfrid Lawson, to welcome Sir Henry Parkes, the Premier of New South Wales, by whom, as the head of the Government, the New South Wales License Bill was brought before the Legislature, and became a law, which provides for Sunday closing and local option throughout the country.

A special meeting of the Commissioners of Sewers was recently held in the Guildhall for the purpose of approving of an agreement in relation to the completion of the Inner Circle Railway between the Mansion House and Aldgate Stations, by which the City authorities undertake to contribute £300,000, and the Metropolitan Board of Works £250,000, towards the new street, sixty feet wide, from Gracechurch-street to Tower-hill. The agreement was ordered to be signed.

OBITUARY.

SIR PYERS MOSTYN, BART.

Sir Pyers Mostyn, eighth Baronet, of Talacre, in the county of Flint, died at his seat near Rhyl, on the 14th inst. He was born Sept. 27, 1811, the eldest son of Sir Edward Mostyn, seventh Baronet, by Frances, his wife, daughter of Mr. Nicholas Blundell, of Crosby, in the county of Lancaster, and was the representative of one of the oldest families in Wales, lineally descended from Tudor Trevor, Lord of Hereford, founder of the tribe of the Marches. He succeeded to the baronetcy (created in 1670) at the decease of his father, July 18, 1841, and married, May 9, 1844, the Hon. Frances Georgiana Fraser, second daughter of Thomas Alexander, Lord Lovat, by whom he leaves five sons and five daughters: the eldest of the latter is widow of Viscount Southwell, K.P., and of the former the eldest is the present Sir Pyers William Mostyn, ninth Baronet, of Talacre, who was born in 1846, and married, in 1880, to Anna Maria, fifth daughter of Mr. Thomas A. Parry, of Litham House, in the county of Warwick. The late Baronet was J.P. and D.L. for Flintshire, and served as High Sheriff in 1843.

SIR JOHN ROSE CORMACK.

Sir John Rose Cormack, M.D., Paris and Edinburgh, F.R.S.E., Physician to the British Infirmary Hospital in the former city, died at his residence, 361, Rue St. Honoré, on the 13th inst. He was born in 1815, the son of the Rev. John Cormack, D.D., Minister of Stow, near Edinburgh, by Helen, his wife, daughter of Mr. John Ross, of Holme, in the county of Inverness; and received his education at Edinburgh and Paris, graduating in both Universities as M.D. He was also a Fellow of the Royal Colleges of Physicians of Edinburgh and London; and during the siege of Paris, 1870 and 1871, acted as surgeon on the field and in the ambulances. His professional services at that memorable epoch elicited the thanks of the French Government and obtained for him the cross of Chevalier of the Legion of Honour; and in the following year, 1872, he was knighted by his own Sovereign. Sir John was author of several medical works. He married, in 1841, Eliza Anne, daughter of Mr. William Hine, of Jamaica.

MR DUGDALE

Mr. William Stratford Dugdale, of Merevale, and Blyth Hall, in the county of Warwick, M.A., J.P. and D.L., High Sheriff 1876, died, on the 9th inst., of injuries caused by an explosion at the Baxterley Colliery, while endeavouring to save life. He was born May 7, 1828, the eldest son of the late Mr. William Stratford Dugdale, of Merevale, M.P. for North Warwickshire, by Harriet Ella, his wife, sister of Viscount Portman, and was the lineal descendant and representative of the celebrated antiquary and genealogist Sir William Dugdale, Garter King of Arms, temp. Charles I. and Charles II. The gentleman whose decease we record was one of the principal landed proprietors of the county in which he resided. He married, Dec. 14, 1871, Alice Frances, youngest daughter of Sir Charles Edward Trevelyan, Bart., of Wallington, Northumberland, K.C.B., and leaves issue. Mr. Dugdale graduated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1850, and was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1858.

MR HENRY WOODS.

Mr. Henry Woods, of Warnford Park, Hants, J.P. and D.L., M.P. for Wigan in the Liberal interest, from 1857 to 1874, and High Sheriff of Hants in 1870, died on the 16th inst. at his town residence in Hyde Park-gardens. He was born Dec. 11, 1822, the son of Mr. William Woods, of Wigan, and Elizabeth, his wife, daughter of Mr. Jonathan Marsden. He married, first, in 1844, Hannah, only child of Mr. Charles Hindley, M.P.; and secondly, in 1864, Henrietta Mary, fifth daughter of Ashurst Turner Gilbert, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester; and leaves issue.

We have also to record the deaths of—

The Duke of Grafton, whose memoir will appear next week.
Mr. Alexander James Baylis, J.P. and D.L., solicitor to the City Commissioners of Sewers, on the 13th inst.

The Rev. Edward Forbes, D.D., Rector of St. Olave's, Old Jewry, Hon. Secretary of the Colonial and Continental Church Society, and formerly Chaplain of the English Church, Rue d'Aguesseau, Paris, on the 12th inst., at Cannes, aged sixty-five.

Mr. John Elton Mervin Prower, of Purton House, Wilts, J.P. and D.L., High Sheriff 1862, and Major Royal Wilts Militia, on the 12th inst. He was born Oct. 11, 1811, and succeeded as heir-at-law to the property of the Eltons of the Hazles, in the county of Hereford.

The Rev. Charles Johnstone, M.A., Canon of York from 1815 to 1874, at his seat, Sutton Hall, Thirsk, on the 15th inst. He was second son of Sir Richard Vanden Bempde Johnstone, Bart., of Hackness Hall, and uncle of Lord Derwent. He was born Aug. 24, 1800, and married, Sept. 13, 1827, Amelia, daughter of the Rev. Richard Hawksworth.

The Rev. James Anderson, D.D., formerly of St. Fergus, the first Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England, on the 17th inst., in his eighty-seventh year. He was educated at the University of Aberdeen, which conferred on him in 1859 the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity. In 1843 he took part in the Disruption, and next year settled at Morpeth.

Mr. Thomas Cobbe, of Easton Lys, barrister-at-law, author of "A History of our Norman Kings," on the 13th inst., in his sixty-ninth year. He was second son of the late Mr. Charles Cobbe, of Newbridge, in the county of Dublin, J.P. and E.L., by Frances, his wife, only daughter of Captain Thomas Conway, of Morden Park, Surrey; and was fourth in descent from Thomas Cobbe, D.D., of Newbridge, Archbishop of Dublin. His sister is the distinguished writer, Miss Frances Power Cobbe.

The chess battle of Vienna was begun on the 10th inst., and since that date has been waged day by day, with the exceptions of the Sundays and one holiday. The holiday, much needed after the severe mental strain of continuous match play, was devoted to a banquet, to which Baron Kolisch invited the competitors and many members of the Vienna Chess Club. Among the most notable incidents of the struggle, so far as it has proceeded, are the series of defeats sustained by Herr Steinitz. His loss of a solitary game to Herr Zukertort occasioned no surprise; but that he should have succumbed to Messrs. Kruby, Ware, and Wittek has excited some astonishment in London chess circles. Herr Kruby is a young player, we are informed, and won his spurs a few months ago by carrying off the first prize in the Vienna club tourney. Of the other gentlemen, it is enough to say that they have not hitherto been reckoned dangerous adversaries in a tournament of chess masters. The game between Messrs. Bird and Mason, in the fourth round, furnishes another interesting episode of the tourney. The American player, it appears, exceeded his time limit (fifteen moves with the hour's play, but Mr. Bird declined to claim the game on that ground, and professed his willingness to play it out. One of the other competitors, however, no doubt with a keener eye to Mr. Mason's victorious record, appealed to the Committee to enforce the rule, and these gentlemen, very properly, directed the game to be scored in favour of Mr. Bird. We give below the score of the tourney to the conclusion of the seventh round. The result of the eighth is imperfect as it has come to hand, but on Saturday it was as follows:—

Kraby drew with Ware; Mason drew with Englisch; Noa beat Schwarz; Zukertort beat Meitner; Winawer beat Paulsen; Wittek beat Steinitz; Blackburne beat Bird. The games between Weiss and Tschigorin, and Piesse and Mackenzie, were unfinished.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated March 2, 1881), with two codicils (dated May 2, 1881, and Jan. 7, 1882), of Mr. William Gilbertson, late of Pontardawe, Glamorganshire, who died on Feb. 4 last, was proved on the 13th inst. by Francis Bramah Gilbertson and Arthur Gilbertson, the sons, and Robert Walker Childs, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £75,000. The testator bequeaths to his son Francis Bramah £6000; to his son Arthur his share and interest in the firm of W. Gilbertson and Co.; to his daughter Mrs. Catharine Ann Richardson £6000, in addition to the amount settled on her at her marriage; to his son Edward Collings and his daughters Fanny, Ellen Louisa, Madeline, and Ellen Maude £7000 each; he also gives to each of his said children some shares in Joshua Williams and Co. and articles of plate and jewellery; to his unmarried daughters his furniture and household effects; to his son Matthias an annuity of £200; and a few other legacies, including one to his coachman, and bequests to each of his female domestic servants according to length of service. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be divided between his sons Francis Bramah, Arthur, and Edward Collings.

The will (dated April 29, 1881) of Mr. Samuel Wimbush, of the firm of Wimbush and Co., Halkin-street, late of Fallow Corner, Finchley, who died on the 6th ult., was proved on the 16th inst. by the Rev. Samuel Wimbush and Barnes Wimbush, the sons, and Henry Wimbush, the brother, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £71,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Caroline Wimbush, pecuniary legacies to the extent of £1800, all the cash in the house, certain plate and furniture, a horse and carriage, and other bequests; to his son Samuel, his freehold land, Parkfield, at Finchley, and £3000; to his son Charles, £500, and he gives him the option of taking certain shares in the partnership business of Wimbush and Co.; to the children of his deceased daughter Mrs. Marianne Ramsey, £500; to his daughters Maria, Sarah, Catherine, Caroline Annie, and Ruth, £5000 each, in addition to certain specific gifts; and the residue of his property, real and personal, to his son Barnes.

The will (dated July 31, 1880), of Mrs. Ellen Gertrude Carter, late of Wickham, in the county of Southampton, who died on the 3rd ult., was proved on the 4th inst. by Alfred Henry Carter, the son, Alfred Bonham Carter, and Bonham William Carter, the executors, the personal estate amounting to over £50,000. The testatrix gives £5500 each to her daughters, Mrs. Ellen Maude Garston, Dorothea Gertrude Carter, Margaret Isabella Georgina Carter, and Mary Hope Carter, and an additional immediate legacy of £50 to each of the three latter; and all her real estate and the residue of the personality to her said son.
